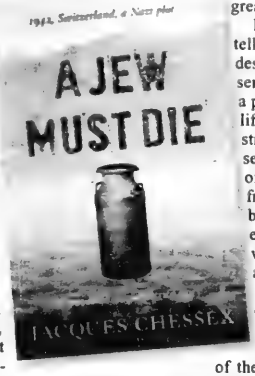
Chessex won the major French literary prize, the Prix Goncourt, for his 1973 novel, The Ogre. He is a major figure in Europe, having published numerous novels, volumes of poetry and children's books. His death in 2009, preceded by a collapse before a Swiss audience, had its own touch of the grotesque, reminiscent of the author's fictional work. Reports of Chessex's demise included the detail that just before he collapsed he had been asked to comment on the arrest by Swiss police of the film director Roman Polanski.

The events that Chessex documents and fictionalizes in A Jew Must Die take place in Payerne, the town where he was born and raised. There are passages in the novel where he conveys the Swiss landscape's vernal loveliness, its "idyllic radiance" in early spring. And the particularity of its local economy is brought home, too, in a scene set at "seven o'clock" as the farmers tether "their beasts on Market Square to the wide metal railings that clank whenever the cows, bullocks and bulls pull on their halters and chains."



The killers are a haphazard group – know-nothing farmhands directed by a Swiss Nazi who pronounces a "Heil Hitler!" after kicking the dead man's corpse. In the leader one senses cravenness; in the followers a kind of lunkish carelessness. Behind their crime lies the influential motivation of a pastor whom the author presents, near the end of the novel, as an unreconstructed anti-Semite.

The Missing Person newspaper announcement placed by the victim's family is moving in its simplicity, and Chessex describes the local response as, at first, "coarse jokes and loaded comments about "'Jewry,''profiteering' and 'parasitic' business." When A Jew Must Die appeared, reviews made claims for the importance of its philosophical views on evil, complicity and human nature. And certainly these are the kinds of themes one expects to be explored in literature that confronts the events of the war.

In a collection of memoiristic stories published shortly after the end of World War II, the Polish author Tadeusz Borowski, who spent a year at Auschwitz, wrote: "Observe in what an original world we are living: how many men can you find in Europe who have never killed; or whom somebody does not wish to kill?" Borowski's dark view of Europe seems to underwrite Chessex's. But A Jew Must Die lacks the detail, the ironic voice and the sympathies of Borowski's great postwar stories.

Part of Chessex's motivation in the telling of his hometown's history is the desire to convey how intimately the sense of guilt over the murder became a part of his and the town's imaginative life. It may be guilt that motivates the strangely emotional concluding scene, set in a Berne Jewish cemetery, which offers "a moment of grace detached from a world where Aryan rule is bloodily imposed." Still, the author's effort at coming to terms with the war's victims races out of control, as he compares the Holocaust to "Golgotha," and invokes the "crown of thorns and the barbed wire of the camps." Clearly a personal cry, A Jew Must Die presents itself as one of the stranger books about the war published by a major author in recent years.

Norman Ravvin is chair of the Concordia University Institute for Canadian Jewish Studies. His books include the story collection Sex, Skyscrapers and Standard Yiddish and A House of Words: Jewish Writing, Identity and Memory.

New Kacer novel for adults

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

Kathy Kacer, an award-winning author of several children's books including Secret of Gabi's Dresser, Clara's War and Hiding Edith, which won the 2009 Yad Vashem Prize for Children's Holocaust Literature, is now releasing her first adult book, Restitution.

Published by Second Story Press, Restitution tells the true story of the Reesers, a Czech Canadian family that faced down Nazis, Communists and corruption to recover four stolen paintings spiritied away just before the Nazi invasion in 1938.

In Restitution, Kacer tells this story in compelling detail, the story fleshed out with the Reeser family's pictures and documents.

The book will be in stores on April 15. You can join Kacer at the launch on April 11 at 3 p.m. at 918 Bathurst (that's the name of the venue, at Bathurst and Bloor streets in Toronto). Joining Kacer will be Karl Reeser, one of the book's central characters.

Passover wine suggestions

By YONATAN STERNBERG
Special to cjnews.com

On seder night, each person (at least those of legal drinking age) is required to drink four glasses of wine. Multiply that by the number of guests, and we are looking at an average of one bottle for every two people, or in other words, a whole lot of wine.

Judging from the number of phone calls I received over the past few weeks as an Israel-based wine expert, it seems that choosing the right wine for the Passover meal is a rather daunting task. Do you start off with a dry or off-dry white wine? Perhaps a light red or a sparkling wine would be a better way to get the evening started? Grape juice is also a good option, especially due to the fact that we pour the first glass before we have eaten anything.

Negev Desert scene of gruelling Israman competition

By DAVID SHULMAN
Special to The CJN

EILAT, Israel — Swim 3.8 kilometres, bike 180 kilometres and then run a full marathon in the winter?

It wouldn't be a Canadian's first choice of sporting activities. But I was curious about a winter iron distance triathlon when I read that Triathlete magazine voted Israman Negev as one of the 10 best iron distance races in the world. I was on my way.

The Negev is a melange of arid, rocky and dusty mountains. The unending landscape of sand and rocks is interrupted here and there by wadis, or dry river beds, and by patches of green. These green oases are the kibbutzim, communal farms where palm trees and all manner of tropical fruits grow.

At the southern end of the barren Negev lies Eilat, a teaming oasis of modernity on the Red Sea. The Red Sea is alive with tropical fish, sharks and rays darting in and out of the profuse, colourful corals. It's a diver's paradise.

Israman Negev 2010 was held on Jan. 29, and the date was chosen for its full moon, which would become important on the run course. Eighty–six competitors from seven countries started the early morning 3.8-kilometre swim in the Red Sea at Eilat. A southerly wind was blowing, creating a moderate surf.

The real challenge of the race was the bike course. Starting at sea level, we climbed 800 metres into the mountains above Eilat in the first 18 kilometres. Stopping at the top to catch my breath, I viewed the majestic scene before me of rolling hills with no vegetation to stop the incessant wind. A single road ran through this moonscape.

The out-and-back course was virtually deserted, other than the water stations and turn-around, where crowds came out to stand on the sand and cheer. The strong southerly winds directly into our faces slowed us to a crawl as we rode southward back toward Eilat.

On the bike course there were insufficient water stops, but the inventive Israelis had already planned for this. In our race kits were cards with a phone number to call for water. At 136 kilometres, my bottles were empty, so I called the number on my cell. Within five minutes a van arrived and gave me full bottles, bananas and dates. Only in Israel.

The bike-to-run transition was at the top of the initial climb. We dismounted and started the run from a plateau, descending into Eilat. While running downhill, I was mesmerized by the spectacular view of the Arava valley at sunset. In the distance, the Jordanian hills turned from café-au-lait to copper. Then we were running in complete darkness on unlighted paved and unpaved roads and dirt tracks. We were provided with headlights and glow sticks and the full moon helped greatly. The finish in Eilat was on the seaside walkway filled with curious passersby and the athletes' supporters.

Israeli Gilad Rotem was the top finisher in 9:26, and the top female was Nina Pekerman in 10:36, world-class times especially for this difficult course.

I finished in 14:40, which was good enough for second place out of five in my age group of 55-plus, and it was good for 46th overall. The last finisher came in at almost 19 hours.

This was an exotic and exciting race and should attract more competitors as word gets out. There was also a half-iron distance and running races for the children during the day, and the atmosphere was festive on the course and at the resort. For me, the difficulty of training in the winter was more than offset by the challenge and beauty of this unique race.

David Shulman, 60, is a resident of Toronto who lived in Israel for eight years. Israman was his sixth iron distance race, including Ironman Canada.

Hank Rosenstein, player in first NBA game, dies at 89

JTA

NEW YORK — Hank Rosenstein, who played for a mostly Jewish New York Knicks team that took part in what is considered the NBA's first game – in Toronto in 1946 – has died.

Rosenstein, a member of the National Jewish Sports Hall of Fame, died Feb. 27 in Boca Raton, Fla., of heart failure. He was 89.

Rosenstein, who at six-foot-four inches played in the frontcourt, was one of eight Jewish Knickerbockers when they played the Toronto Huskies in Toronto on Nov. 1, 1946 in the debut of the new Basketball Association of America (BAA). He scored five points in a game won by the Knicks 68-66.

The BAA merged with the National Basketball League in 1949 to form the National Basketball Association (NBA) and the NBA considers the Knicks-Huskies game its first.

Rosenstein was traded to the Providence Steamrollers, then helped the Scranton Miners of the American Basketball League to championships in 1949-50 and 1950-51. In the latter season, he led the team in scoring with an average of 11.7 points.

He later became a coach in the Eastern Pro League.

Rosenstein, who also starred at Boys High School in Brooklyn and City College, was inducted into the Jewish Hall of Fame in 1998 and the New York City Basketball Hall of Fame in 2007.

Gifts from my father

By MICHAEL GORDON

Ephraim's brown eyes were like saucers – bright and full of excitement.

I had a plastic kite in my hand, and I was checking the somewhat unclear diagrammatic instructions. I knew from my childhood how to put the kite together to achieve the aerodynamic shape it needed to fly. As I unravelled the long red plastic tail, I could feel the wind tugging at the plastic that was longing to catch the wind.

The Senior Side of Life

It rose above the other kites that were held by children from the low-income, primarily immigrant community of Bat Yam, south of Tel Aviv. Ephraim, an eight-year-old Ethiopian immigrant, danced around the sandy beach, yelling to his friends to look at his kite.

He tugged on the string, letting more out as the kite pulled higher than all the other kites, some of which had not been assembled correctly and circled furiously before hitting the ground. The owners then picked them up and adjusted the sticks and the strings, to try to achieve aerodynamic success.

Bat Yam's sandy beach reminded me of Brighton Beach in New York, where, as a child, I flew kites with my engineer father. Pre-formed kites did not exist then. We cut the material from which the kite was made and bought the dowels and string in a hardware store.

My father was a master at kite building and flying, and taught me how to make a good kite. We would sit on the beach with the kite flying high, or if we went to sports fields, we would sit on the grass with the kite often so high, we could hardly see it, or so it seemed to me.

Even though Ephraim's kite was pre-made out of plastic and wood, it was based on the same principles I had internalized so many years previously. Ephraim's excitement lasted all afternoon. After we brought the kite down, he continued to describe its flight to his classmates.

Of the many gifts from my father, kite flying was not the most dramatic or one I might have recalled, if not for the Bat Yam visit. His gifts to me have helped sustain me throughout life and continue to impact my life.

My love for books was nurtured by his taking my younger sister and me to the local library every Saturday. We would return home with a pile of books for the week's reading. He loved libraries and would say, "The library is the most wonderful invention of mankind." And when we learned to ask the question, "Why is that, Daddy?", he would reply with his standard, "Because it contains all the knowledge of the world within it."

I tried to follow suit with my own children many years later. Our financial situation, unlike that of my childhood, made it possible for us to buy books, however, I continued to love libraries.

Other gifts I received from my father include the desire to understand how things work – from his engineering background, a profession I, too, almost pursued. Lastly, he gave me, along with my mother, a love for music and, most profoundly, a sense of fairness and social justice. What more could a child ask for to sustain a lifetime?

He is 98, and although not very communicative these days, his gifts will be with me for the rest of my life. I hope I have transmitted at least some of them to my own children.

Vitamin D: are you getting enough?

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Vitamin D is often called "the sunshine vitamin," because our skin produces it when exposed to UVB rays from the sun.

Vitamin D helps maintain normal blood levels of calcium and phosphorus, assists in the absorption of calcium, may prevent hypertension, MS, osteoporosis and even some cancers.

It's obviously important, but do we get enough? The problem in Canada is that in the winter months, we don't get enough sunlight of the quality required to produce sufficient vitamin D. We may not even get enough in summer because we use sunscreen or wear protective clothing. Even dark pigmented or aging skin reduces the amount of vitamin D production possible.

How much do we need? Adults age 19 to 50 require a minimum of 200 IU per day. Older adults require more: age 51 to 70, a minimum of 400 IU; and 70+, 600 IU. It's recommended that we not exceed 2,000 IU. I would suggest aiming for about 1,000-1,200 IU for adults daily, especially in winter.

Canadian Pediatric Society suggests pregnant women get 2,000 IU per day and breast-fed infants be supplemented with 400-800 IU per day. Infant formula is supplemented with vitamin D. Children and teens also need about 400 IU per day.

Can we find enough vitamin D in our food? Although dairy products are fortified with Vitamin D, it's hard to get enough from food. Some good sources are wild salmon: 3.5 oz. has a whopping 600-1,000 IU; farmed salmon, though, only has 100-250 IU in 3.5 oz.; canned salmon is 300-600 IU, 1 cup cow's milk (fortified) only 88 IU.

If we need to rely on supplementation, we have several choices. Supplements come in many varieties, from drops for babies to pills for adults, gummies for children and chews for all ages. Choose vitamin D3 for optimal absorption.

Always check with your doctor first and make sure you aren't combining this with another supplement that may cause you to exceed safe limits.

Pesach: Mom loved the fish heads

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

The seder was about to begin.

The chandelier on the ceiling in the dining room illuminated the table and its finery. A bulbous white pillow had been placed on my father's armchair, waiting to be creased by his recline, and sweet and tearing Pesach smells intertwined with the aromas of the rest of year. Eliyahu would accept our invitation, wholeheartedly.

URBAN WRITER

The Pesach plate was prepared. So was the delicious meal. Egg. Bone. Maror. Karpas. Charoset. Chazeret. The fish heads my mother loved, stared up at us as if disappointed. Everyone had chosen their favourite wine-stained Haggadah.

The guests had arrived.

Nobody was ever turned away from our seder. Indeed, if an artist were to paint it, it would look like a busier Last Supper. As a little person, I saw layers upon layers of company, some of whom were familiar, others who were newcomers, and still others who were mendicants, living on alms.

From time to time, my elbows resented the fact they had nowhere to rest on the table, but mostly I was in wonderment at the exaggerated "space versus people" formula these holidays allowed. Old ladies living alone; zestful, ideological university students debating Hegel; Jews and non-Jews. They were all present. Lots of them.

It was the opening night of the Exodus, and like Jerusalem, which expanded during the three pilgrimage festivals, so too did our home. It was awe-inspiring.

My father welcomed us all to the seder: "Family, friends, once we were in Egypt. Today we are free.

"History is now," he would say. "We are Nachshon ben Aminadav. We are the Jews who escaped Egypt. Dive into the sea," he would shout.

My father continued: "We are the Jewish People, and tonight Moses sits at our table and so does the sweet Jewish sexton from Kiev. We are they, and they are us."

And he never forgot the Holocaust, even in good times. Nor did he forget the Inquisition, the pogroms or the Jewish community leaders hanged in Iran in our times.

"Let us remember our kedoshim tonight, those Jews who courageously broke the middle matzah in Auschwitz to remember Yitziyat Mizrayim [the Exodus from Egypt]."

My mother was the hero, though. She was the chief chef, the general, the industrial engineer navigating, and adjusting the Passover table and its place-settings, in order to squeeze one more person around the table. Our seder was chaos contained. And my mother made sure those who were hungry came and ate.

We poured the wine. We blessed it and drank. (I was tipsy. It's great to be a Jew. I'd been drinking since my bris.) I stood and sang Ma Nishtanah (the Four Questions) in Hebrew and Yiddish. Father was perturbed when I said Mr. Been in place of "misubin." But I had to. I was a kid.

Rabbi Tarphon and Rabbi Eleazar ben Azariah sat and learned in B'nei Brak. We said Dayeinu, ate, sang about a goat and talked Torah until 2 a.m.

By then, most of the guests had gone home. Much of the family slept, their heads resting on folded arms at the table. But I was awake and ever so proud. Tomorrow I'll be asked how long our seder went. I will say till 2:30 in the morning. Nobody would beat that.

Today, years later, some of us are gone. But that Passover grandeur and camaraderie will forever be ours. It will be mine – because I was a kid and everything was 10 feet taller. I was free.

Chag Samayach. Happy Pesach. Next year in Jerusalem?

Wiedergutmachung

By PEARL ADLER SABAN

Wieder: "again"
Gut: "good"
Machung: noun form of verb machen," meaning "to make"
"To make good again."
Reparation.
Restitution.

He never took a penny of the money – the money that should have been coming to him, too – leaving it instead to the masses to take and do with it what they willed.

Condos in Miami.
Holidays on sunny isles.
Visits to Israel and European spas.
A new luxury car
every few years.

He suffered,
oh, how he suffered.
A victim of circumstance from such a young age.
His losses were great – immeasurable really.
You can't measure a life.
You can't measure a loss,
he explained.
Yet he did spend a lifetime measuring.
Measuring lengths, waists and inseams
but more importantly, measuring his words and actions.

Reparation – this blood money was not for him.

"Your life can be made easier."
"You have it coming to you."
"At least you'd have that."
Taunting refrains that he continually ignored.

Wiedergutmachung.
"To make good again."
And he did.
On his own.

Rebirth

By DOROTHY GOLDWATER

The dream Herzl created
By a nightmare was related
Into a laughless mirth
Creating Israel's birth...
Israel is the resurrection.
Rejected by the Orthodox
Who await messianic direction
She remains the Mid-East paradox.
A symbol of man's self-affirmation
Against basest forms of negation
Is her strong will to survive
And keep human ideals alive,
Strong on remembering the past,
she is becoming modern fast.
In a world where peace is hard won
She is not waiting to be outdone .
Theatre, fashion, music and art
Are alive and play an important part
Having multi-cultural national root
Never forgetting the Nazi boot,
Israel is full of arrogance
There is no time for false penance,
She is the Noah's ark of diaspora Jew
And pure gold of an alchemist's brew ...

The Pesach Dishes

By PAULA HURWITZ

I wake up early this morning, before the rest of my family, and creep into my parents room. "Mommy, wake up," I whisper as I gently shake her shoulder.

"Sarah, it's before seven. What's the matter?" she groans. She rolls over to face me and barely opens one eye.

"Mommy, isn't it time to go to Baba's to get ready for the seder? You know Baba needs my help today."

"Honey, the seder's not until sundown. You've got hours to prepare. Baba's probably still sleeping and you should be too. Go back to bed, I'll wake you when it's time." Mommy rolls over again so I know I better leave.

I wander back to my room and crawl under my quilt but I'm too excited to sleep. Pesach is one of my favourite holidays. I'm the oldest granddaughter, a big girl of eight, and Baba lets me help her set the table. My little sister is five, still a baby, so she's not allowed to help, she might break something.

Everyone's going to be at the seder tonight, me, mommy, daddy, my sister, and my aunt and uncle and cousins. Baba's brothers and sisters will be there too because their children and grandchildren live far away. So Zaida will add two bridge tables to the end of the dining room table and Baba will cover them with white tablecloths.

The prettiest lace tablecloth goes on the dining room table where the old people sit. I sit with my sister and cousins at the bridge table that stretches into Baba's living room. Baba gives us her 'everyday' tablecloth just in case somebody spills grape juice. Mommy and daddy and my aunt and uncle sit at the table in between us and the old people.

Illustration by Trevor Miller

At 8:00, mommy finally says I can come out of my room. I hurry through my breakfast and get dressed. Daddy's staying home today since it's the start of Pesach, so my sister stays with him while mommy drives me to Baba's.

After mommy parks the car she holds my hand until we get inside, but once in the lobby I race to the elevator and push the up button. Mommy shouts, "don't get on the elevator without me Sarah!" I jump up and down as I watch the numbers light up, "12, 11, 10..." When the "L" lights up the doors open. Mommy and I step inside and I push four, Baba's floor.

Baba's hallway smells like Pesach; gefilte fish, chicken soup, brisket and turkey. I guess Baba's not the only one having a seder tonight. When I get to the corner apartment, I knock on the door. Zaida bellows, "who's there?"

"It's me Sarah. Let me in Zaida."

"Sarah? Sarah who? Baba do we know any Sarahs?"

"Zaida, you know me, it's Sarah your granddaughter. I'm here to help with the seder."

"Sarah my granddaughter. Of course, why didn't you say so."

Zaida laughs as he opens the door and lifts me into a big hug. I hear Baba's 'Tender Tootsies' padding about the kitchen so I wriggle out of Zaida's arms, quickly say goodbye to Mommy and report for duty.

A big pot of gefilte fish is bubbling on the stove and Baba's stuffing the turkey at the counter. Steaming Pesach rolls sit in a basket on the small kitchen table. Zaida's already got the bridge tables and the extra chairs set up. I see he's even remembered to put a pillow on his seat. That's where he always hides the afikoman.

While bending to kiss me, holding her stuffing coated hands away from my hair and clothes, Baba says, "Sarah, I'm so glad you're here. You know where I keep the good dishes, in the hutch in the living room. Why don't you start taking out the plates and setting the table. There's going to be 18 of us tonight. Can you count to 18?"

"Of course I can count to 18 Baba. I'm already in grade three!"

"Okay then Sarah, you use your counting skills to get that table set while I finish the turkey. Zaida can help you carry if anything's too heavy."

I go to the living room hutch and open the bottom cupboard. I carefully pull out the padded cases that Baba uses to store her good china. I unzip the biggest one to find the dinner plates.

I think Baba's dishes are beautiful. They're white with a shiny gold circle around the edge. Each plate is separated by a round piece of foam so they don't get scratched. Once I've counted out 18, Zaida puts them in a pile on the table and then I set one in front of each chair. I do the same with soup bowls and fish plates. The dessert plates and cups and saucers I stack on top of the sideboard so we can use them after dinner.

After I lay a napkin and Haggadah at each place, I get to my favourite part, the cutlery. Baba keeps it in a big wooden box. She says that the special cloth inside keeps the silver shiny. Sometimes we still have to polish the knives but today they look just right. At the bottom of the box I pull out a knob revealing a secret compartment. That's where I find the teaspoons. I carefully place the silverware next to each plate. Now the table's complete, except for the wine glasses. Zaida has to do those because I can't reach yet but, Baba says maybe next year. I already can't wait until next year.

Fast-forward 30 years. Again I wake up early to prepare for Pesach, but now the seder's at my house. Now I have an eight-year-old of my own to help me. After breakfast my daughter's anxious to start setting the table. We go to our dining room wall unit and, with tears in my eyes, I help her remove those same padded cases that I'd pulled from Baba's hutch so many years ago.

You see, Baba's in a nursing home now, suffering from Alzheimer's. When Zaida could no longer care for her, she moved, and now there are no seders at Baba and Zaida's. But Zaida knew Baba would not want her Pesach dishes to sit unused. He lovingly packed all the padded cases into boxes and my mother put those boxes in her car and drove them across the country to me.

When my daughter and I open the cases, we find the white and gold dishes. The gold is faded and scratched in places, and some of the plates are separated by napkins instead of the round pieces of foam that by now have been lost or torn but, to me, the dishes are still as beautiful as they were when I was a little girl.

My daughter places the dishes on the table and then I show her the cutlery box. She removes forks, knives and soup spoons but can't find the teaspoons. Her eyes open wide and she claps her hands when I point out the secret compartment, enjoying it as much as I did.

When the table is set, we call Zaida.

"Hello Zaida, it's me Sarah."

Zaida returns to his old joke, "Sarah who?"

"Sarah your granddaughter, of course, goot yontiff, Zaida."

"Oh, Sarah my granddaughter, why didn't you say so?" Zaida's encouraged by my daughter's background giggles.

"Zaida, we just set the table. I used Baba's dishes and silverware. It looks beautiful. I wish you could be here with us."

"I wish I could be with you too Sarah, but I'm too old to travel. Instead, I'll spend a quiet Pesach with Baba at the home. I'll tell her about the dishes though, she'll be so pleased. Now let me talk to that great granddaughter of mine."

"Okay, here she is. Goodbye Zaida. And thank you."

Six months later, Zaida is gone. And by the following Pesach, Baba is laid to rest beside him. But my daughter still rises early the morning of the seder.

"Mommy, wake up. It's time to set the table."

"Honey, we've got hours until the seder. Why don't you get more sleep."

"But Mommy, Zaida and Baba's dishes have been waiting all year for another seder. I don't think we should keep them waiting anymore."

As I drag myself out of bed, remembering my younger self, I laugh and say, "you're probably right. Let's get those Pesach dishes on the table."

And when I pull the aging foam packages out of the wall unit, I don't know whether to laugh or cry. I still miss Baba and Zaida so much, but with the white and gold dishes on my table it feels like they've come to celebrate Pesach with us again.

Wishing good health and happiness to all our friends and clients during this season of celebration and reflection.

Westerbork

By RHONDA HASSMANN

I walk up the gravel path in the rain under an enormous black umbrella, the kind you see in Holland, across the grey-green misty fields along the hundred and two railway ties for the 102,000 deported
At the far end is the punishment block where they kept Anne Frank, the special block for those who tried to hide to escape
to live
Maybe that's where they held my Tante Käthe before they sent her off on one of the Tuesday trains, 1,000 people per train
every Tuesday morning
If there weren't enough people to fill the train everyone could live another week to sing and dance for their captors every Tuesday evening

The Invisible Shrine

By ESTHER A. DAGAN

Invisible. Hidden within my soul, a shrine.
Folded, wrinkled in, memories of spirits.
My compass. The torch to the light of my north.
The spirits of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob.
The spirits of judges, kings and prophets.
The spirits of warriors, heroes, sinners, poets.
And my ancestors weeping on the shores of Babylon
Still weeping at the Wailing Wall.
Invisible. Hidden within my soul, a shrine.
Folded, wrinkled in, memories of families and loved ones.
My compass. The torch to my future passed.
The spirits of many I loved and long have gone.
The spirits of my parents, a grandfather who named me Malka.
The spirit of my daughter, a butterfly above an erupting volcano.
And my first love, a trumpet player in an army band.
On his grave: "Sacrificed his life to free Jerusalem 1930-1948".
Invisible. Hidden within my soul, a shrine.
Folded, wrinkled in, memories of foreign deities.
The spirits of Telem, Njoku, Mamiwata, Eshu and Kalunga.
Periodically, masked in full regalia all reappear.
On Jewish holidays, on national and memorial days.
Enchanting, uplifting and elevating my spirit to the sublime.
And deeply engraved in my multiple mixed identity.
My compass. The torch leading to my daughter's grave.

Passover Greetings

A light From the ashes

By ORITTE RUDSKI

Mumbai. 2008.
I searched for truth in an ashram.
But found it in myself.

A flame shines. Warm.
Bright. Comforting.
I stare, not believing,
Through the tears in my eyes.
I see a candle burning.
A candle that I lit.
Years ago I ran away from the light from the candles... from the joy of the Sabbath for it gave me no joy.
As I hid in my room and listened to my music
Under the dark covers, the song of happy voices
taunted and mocked...
"You'll never be like us"
Echoed their silent chant.
"Your questions have no answers."
"We have no arms wide enough to hug away your pain."
I traveled to the farthest fields
To harvest foreign crops,
Through dark and hidden tunnels
To mine a stranger's gold.
My questions still remained.
Tonight I see the tears of a child
Rising from the ashes of terror.
My terror, my tears, my childhood.
I reach out and hug this child
With the light of my Sabbath candles.

'Rabbi Ortzig's tsuris sack'

By HERTZIG AARON BENJAMIN

The little Litvak shtetl of Ackmene was thick with complaint. Everyone was miserable. Everyone was whining. No one was listening or helping, working or loving. They'd almost forgotten how to daven. The entire village, 47 miles southeast of Riga, was perpetually pulsing with self-absorbed kvetching. It was a mess. Life was at a standstill.

The wise and judicious Ackmener Rabbi decided that something had to be done. All this constant, disruptive fussing had to stop, and the sooner the better. But how? What to do? Rabbi Ortzig (for that was the name of the 90-year-old rabbi of this poverty-stricken Litvak town) sat on a rock and reached for a solution from heaven that was made for Jews on earth. He thought and he puzzled. He wondered and meditated. He fasted, prayed and wept. And eventually, because HaShem loved him like a father loves a son, he was rewarded with illumination.

Shortly before noon on a brilliant summer's day, Rabbi Ortzig summoned the Ackmener Yidden to the centre of the village. He made them stand in a huge circle under the broiling sun. Rich and poor, able and lame, smart and foolish, everyone was present.

"Not the old, nor the sick, nor the anti-social!" the elderly rabbi proclaimed. "Let this be like at Har Sinai! No one left behind in Mitzrayim!" And no one was. From the oldest grandparents down to the youngest children, everyone schvitzed equally.

Oy, but such a racket! The great circle of shtetl Jews was abuzz with queries, theories and newly-minted complaints about why they were where they were and how it couldn't possibly be one degree hotter even in Odessa, Izmir or Eretz Yisroel. O, those never ending Yiddishe complaints!

After calling for quiet, Rabbi Ortzig produced an immense sack of great age, which he placed in the middle of the circle. That got everyone's attention, for this was the legendary "Tsuris Sack" passed down to Rabbi Ortzig by his great-great grandfather, the storied Itzik-Avrum, the Ackmener Chacham. Itzik-Avrum's sack hadn't been seen in the village since Rabbi Ortzig was a yeshiva boy of 14.

Since many villagers had always thought the sack's existence was only a bubbe meise, there was a brisk flurry of wary speculation concerning its provenance, significance and impending use. Soon enough, a cranky crescendo of Jewish gossip rose high into the sky. So high, in fact, that busy though He was, HaShem himself could hear the shrill obligato ascending from ha'aretz to shomayim. Such a village of grievance was this, this fractious, compulsive shtetl!

Again, Rabbi Ortzig was compelled to call for quiet, whereupon he instructed the villagers to take their most painful and pressing problems to the centre of the circle and push them deep inside Itzik-Avrum's tsuris sack. Now, because the old rabbi was a compassionate and scholarly man who had seen them through thick and thin during the pogroms of the goyim, the locals complied without question. One by one, they stowed their well-nurtured sorrows inside the rabbi's enormous bag. Then they returned to their places on the circumference of the circle to wait and watch. Anticipation was intense. The air within the circle felt electric. Sparks of divine light flew hither, thither and yon.

It went on like this for hours, a constant parade of miserable Jews divesting themselves of their life-defining distress until, eventually, the rabbi's sack had grown into an immense, swollen, heaving mass of human aggravation. It was so filled to the brim with festering krenks and broigus that there wasn't room enough left for even the smallest whimper of the tiniest baby.

Rabbi Ortzig was exceedingly pleased. "So far so good," he thought to himself. "Emmes, this is going well." But he was not yet done. For there was something else still up his sleeve, and it wasn't his tfillin.

Dwarfed by the colossal container of contentiousness, the good rabbi announced that, "in accordance with generations of Jewish wisdom," he could now reveal that it was not actually the Almighty's plan to relieve the Yidden of Ackmene of their every trouble and worry on this particular day.

"A human being is a receptacle for all that life has to offer," he explained, "the good and the bad, the happy and sad. When Mashiach comes, we will greet him with perfect hearts because the world will be redeemed. But until that blessed day..." Rabbi Ortzig's voice trailed away, leaving unsaid what didn't need saying.

The village Jews understood. They were waiting for redemption. They were desperate for a consignment of cure from Above. But the Mashiach, the one whose presence they craved with full mind and soul, would never come, this was certain. Yet, because they were Jews, and Jews are chosen to wait, they weren't free to give up hope that, somehow, miraculously, he might still arrive when they weren't looking!

Only the beleaguered Jews of Ackmene could survive such existential ambiguity. And this was the true source of their power in a hateful world so keen to see them destroyed. They groaned a collective groan. "Oy!" they murmured. "Oy! Enough already!"

But Rabbi Ortzig was still not finished. "Starting now," he said, "starting here, we will begin to redeem the world, one Jew at a time."

Imbued with superhuman strength (for great wisdom in old rabbis often wears the cloak of magical powers), he hoisted the congested tsuris sack high above his head and turned it upside down. With a calamitous rush and a deafening roar, all the agonized distractions of the village spilled out in a mountainous pile! A chaotic collection of personal catastrophe, it was! A veritable Everest of individual woe!

The Ackmeners were dismayed by the terrible sight. "Oy!" they muttered again. "Oy! Dayenu!" But, no, it was not sufficient. With the afternoon waning and Minchah fast approaching, there was not a moment to lose.

Rabbi Ortzig ordered his flock to contemplate each of the crawling, mewling miseries now on display at the centre of town. "Consider well the sorrows you see before you!" the trusted sage admonished. "Know what krenks fill your neighbours' hearts!" And because their beloved rav was an honourable, respected leader so obviously gifted with powerful and exemplary oratory, the men and women and boys and girls did precisely that. They contemplated and they considered. They ruminated and they cogitated. They imagined and they dreamed. Everyone in the little town studied the unhappy causes of their collective depression. They investigated them. They discussed them. They extrapolated them.

The sun began to set. The village had an immediate appointment with Minchah and could not be late. Gratified though he was with the work of the day, Rabbi Ortzig was still not done. He raised a trembling hand to the sky, closed his eyes and petitioned The Holy One, blessed be He, in the privacy of his heart: "Master, if it be Your will, I need a little more time."

The sun suddenly stopped its transit to the other side of the world. For once and once only, the village of noisy Jews fell utterly silent in dumbstruck awe of the scorching crimson ball pinned motionless to the Latvian horizon. They knew they were now in God's time.

In a commanding voice, Rabbi Ortzig instructed the Jews of Ackmene to return to the centre of the circle and select one lone tsuris from among all the others – that one solitary misery they believed they could live with for the rest of their days. And because they trusted their communal guide, they complied once more. Quickly but orderly, and one by one, from the oldest zayde to the youngest seamstress-in-training, they hurried back to the tsuris pile. Then one by one, they resumed their designated places in the circle, each schlepping his or her very own precious and life-defining heartache!

In the end, it was all as it had been at the beginning; nothing had changed. For it was exactly as Rabbi Ortzig had foreseen on the riverbank. Having witnessed the crippling sorrows that all the other Jews of the village had been afflicted with for so very long, each Ackmener was only too happy to reclaim his or her original burden. As one young bride was overheard whispering to her chatan: "My sadness and I are one. We belong to each other from here to eternity. From now until the hour of Mashiach." And so it was for one and all.

The sun roused from its miraculous sleep and sank into a distant, unseen sea. After davening Minchah-Ma'ariv, Rabbi Ortzig folded the battered tsuris sack and dismissed the villagers, blessing each and every one by name. He shook the hands of the men and boys with great vigour; he bowed with dignified respect to the women and girls. And they all went about their business, smiling happily at one another and at peace within themselves at last.

From that day forward, they worked, they loved, they learned in cheder, they prayed in shul and they hoped fervently for the redemption of the world. They lived and coped and waited patiently for the time of Mashiach. And of course, they continued to suffer, too, each in his or her special way. Their lives remained imperfect, because the world remained unrepaired, as it does to this very day; but somehow they endured. They had their beloved Rabbi Ortzig. They had their faith in HaShem. And, most of all, they had one another.

Harmony came to the Litvak shtetl of Ackmene, 47 miles southeast of Riga, because each and every Jew finally understood how serious and worrying were the troubles of his family, friends and neighbours.

SMART SET

In The Mikvah

By FRANCINE DICK

I go down once and the little girl appears, naked and violated,
filled with fear.
I weep for her shame,
I ache with her pain,
for all that she suffered,
how I held her to blame.
I come back up
and the little girl is gone,
I come up to the Rabbi's voice lifted in song.

I go down twice and the rebel is there, vocal and cocky, an insouciant air.
underneath fearful, acquiescent, confused,
a soul that is hidden by drugs and by food.
Stumbling along, falling farther and lower, taking the hand that is held out toward her.
I come back up
ready to be renewed,
I come up to the Rabbi and I saying Shehechianu.

I go down thrice
And I am I.
No longer why?
My body is mine, its strength and its pleasure,
a spirit connected, no longer tethered.
At peace with myself and with my past, free to move forward, my own self at last.
I come back up
and see a different face in the mirror,
I come up
filled with faith and free from fear.

Shabbat dinner on Brookdale

By RACHEL ORNOY

I was invited to Shabbat dinner at my friend's cousin's home. I met the cousin, Lilly, a couple of times at Sarah's house for lunch, and once at a book club. She seemed to be a very nice lady, friendly and intelligent.

The last time I saw her was at the Promenade Mall where she was having coffee and invited me to join her. We had an interesting conversation about children, politics and books. When I got up to leave, she said, "I would love to have you and your husband for Shabbat dinner. Are you free this Friday at 7 p.m.?"

"Thank you. We will be delighted. What is your address?"

"We are not too far from you – 235 Brookdale Ave."

"Thank you. We will be there," I said and shook her hand.

That week was a very busy one with many meetings during the evenings, so I was looking forward to a relaxed Shabbat dinner with Lilly and her husband. I assumed there would be other guests and was pleased at the opportunity to meet new people.

"As far as I know, they are religious, at least observant," I told my husband.

"How do you know, and why are you mentioning it to me?" he asked.

"I seem to remember that her cousin Sarah told me that a long time ago, when she first mentioned her. Also Lilly declined my offer to bring a pie, saying she keeps a very kosher kitchen. I think that it will be best to bring a kosher wine. You will be in charge of it."

Friday morning arrived, and as always, much too fast for me.

"Can you believe it's already Friday?" I asked my husband before he left for work.

He smiled. "You always ask me this question. Every Friday."

It was true. I always did. I was not happy with how fast the week passed, and with it, the months and the years. I was not looking forward to growing older, let alone so quickly.

"Don't forget to buy the wine" I called after him.

He waved his hand, as if to say, "I heard you."

Part of my unhappiness in growing older involved the various deficiencies I discovered in myself, my husband and my friends. We are talking about people in their late 50s. I thought we were too young for all these difficulties. (Especially me, who for the last – too many years to mention – still celebrate my 30th birthday.)

One friend, for example, lost the hearing in the right ear, another in the left. They can hear when you speak to the good ear, but I could never remember which is which.

It is even worse when both men are in the room at the same time. I am never sure if they heard me or just smile out of politeness.

Then there are friends – and this includes me – who need glasses either for reading or for seeing far.

Just the other day, we went to a restaurant and saw two of the couples we came to meet sitting with their backs to us. Suddenly one of them started calling and waving to a couple who came in through the other door. Her friend pulled her down and turned her around toward us.

"Those are not Rachel and Jack. Look, here are Rachel and Jack coming in the other door."

My friend smiled sheepishly. "Without my glasses, the other couple looked like them."

Memory is one of the "big ones" – they are all complaining of their short-term memory. The most popular complaint, which I heard often: "I opened the fridge and stood there for awhile till the hair in my nose froze, but could not remember what I am looking for."

My friend called me last week. "Rachel, I know I needed to call but can't remember why. Can you tell me why I'm calling you?"

My husband will often ask me in the restaurant, "What is this dish?"

"Don't you remember you ate it last time?"

"Did I like it?"

So you can imagine my frustration when my husband arrived at 6 p.m. that evening, empty handed.

"Sorry, I forgot."

We showered and changed and decided on Plan B. I would go to Lilly's house and he would follow, after buying the wine. At least only one of us might be a bit late.

I find that if I repeat something again and again, I remember it better. In the car I repeated the address – 235 Brookview Rd. I was quite sure I knew where it was, as I pass this street quite often.

The sun was starting to set, and I couldn't see the numbers. I drove slowly, mumbling about how inconsiderate people are who don't have large numbers on the front of their houses.

It was 6:45 when I arrived at Lilly's house. The light was on and the number was 235. I knocked on the door, but there was no answer. I went and looked through the living room window and could see the table in the dining room set with a white tablecloth, flowers and long white candles. I knocked again and tried the handle and pushed the door open.

"Hello! Lilly! Can you hear me?" I took off my boots and put on my dress shoes. Took off my coat and put it on the banister. "Lilly, it's Rachel. I came early to see if you need help." Still no answer.

But the festive table with the gefilte fish on the small plates and the covered challah at the head of the table were a sure sign that Lilly was expecting us.

"Maybe her husband went to the synagogue and she is taking a shower. I will wait for her."

I surveyed the large kitchen – one of these open concept rooms that includes a sitting area. It was very homey. There was a big pot of chicken soup on the stove, a plate of fruit and two cakes on the kitchen table. The enticing smell of cinnamon, garlic and fried onion was overwhelming. Especially because I was so hungry and could hear my stomach rumbling.

I went to the staircase leading to the second floor and called softly, "Lilly, are you there?"

I was now wondering if maybe she was having a nap. She couldn't be in the shower that long. I didn't dare wake her, so I called softly again, but probably her door was closed, so she couldn't hear me. I consoled myself that her husband would be here momentarily and he would wake her.

I sat down at the kitchen table and read The Canadian Jewish News that was lying there. Next to it was a slice of bread. While reading, I kept eying the bread. "To eat or not to eat," I asked myself in a dramatic voice.

"We will not eat before 7:30, after all the singing and the blessings," I argued with myself. "Knowing Lilly, she won't begrudge me a slice of bread."

It was a bit dry, so I toasted it. I felt awkward about taking anything from the fridge to spread on the toast. Instead, I filled a soup bowl with a bit of the tantalizing smelling chicken soup.

"I am sure Lilly won't mind, especially when I did not break any kashrut rule," I convinced myself. Now I will be better able to survive the praying and the singing that precede every Shabbat meal.

Now what? I glanced at my watch and was surprised to see that it was 10 minutes past 7. "What is going on?"

My cell rang, and I jumped up, startled.

"Where are you?" my husband asked.

"Where are YOU? I am waiting for you in Lilly's kitchen," I said.

"No, I am waiting for YOU in Lilly's kitchen," he said.

It was almost like a table tennis game between us, back and forth, back and forth, till we decided to stop – and start from the beginning.

"I am at 235 Brookview Rd.," I said triumphantly.

"I am at 235 Brookdale Ave.," he said patiently. "And because Lilly and the rest of the guests are here with me, I know I am in the right place. Whose house are you in?"

"I don't know. I don't have anyone to ask, and frankly, I don't want to know. I am on my way."

Rushing to the hall, I grabbed my boots and my coat and was ready to leave when the door opened.

He was tall and pleasant-looking with a salt and pepper beard, and wearing a black coat and hat.

We stood there looking at each other for a long moment.

"Good Shabbes." He smiled at me. "Are you one of the guests? Where is Arlene? Are you coming or going?"

The door opened again, and a pretty woman rushed in. She glanced at both of us and said, "I went to talk to Leah, my next door neighbour. I see you brought a guest?" She looked at her husband.

"I thought you invited another guest." He sounded puzzled. Now they both looked at me.

At that moment, I had one wish, and one wish only. That the floor would open up and swallow me.

How could I explain the situation without sounding stupid, strange and unbelievable when I found it hard to believe myself?

A thought crossed my mind, and I asked, "Do you know Lilly Epstein?"

"Of course. Lilly and Aaron belong to our shul," the woman said.

What a relief. Now my story sounded more believable, and they burst out laughing at the end of it. I just smiled weakly – I still felt embarrassed and very uncomfortable.

"Thank you for your hospitality." I shook their hands, and as I was leaving, I had the chutzpah to give them advice: "Lock your door, even when you just go to your neighbour's, Leah."

I did not feel like going to Lilly's house anymore, as you can imagine, but could not leave my husband hostage there. Lucky for me, I arrived a bit late, so they accepted my short explanation and we went on with the songs and the blessings.

It was a Shabbat dinner to remember. I started it at 235 Brookview Rd. and ended it at 235 Brookdale Ave. in Toronto.

The Kaddish Club

By PEARL ADLER SABAN

Shabbos morning.

The shul kitchen.

A small gathering of men stand around a counter that holds a plate of schmaltz herring, a box of crackers, and a small stack of plastic shot glasses.

One man reaches into the refrigerator to remove from a lower shelf a bottle of aged Glenfiddich, a tall shapely bottle of vodka, and a well-used bottle of Crown Royal.

Another man takes a head count, then takes orders and pours the amber or clear liquids into the disposable mini cups.

Another man offers a loud l'chaim. Yet another adds his own brachah: "To simchahs, tov and shalom". And punctuating that brachah is an added, hearty "And parnossah" by yet another man.

This Kiddush Club exists – in spite of the fact that the OU frowns on this and countless other boys' clubs; in spite of the fact that the OU decreed and HIGHLY RECOMMENDED that kiddush clubs be banished.

For the quarter of an hour that these men gather and shmooze, they are brothers –

Spirited souls whose hearts might be lively at this hour of the morning, or whose heads might be heavy with thoughts that they need to share.

The Kiddush Club. A haven of sorts. A gathering of minds and laughter.

Tell me please:

How does one go from being a respected, longtime member of the Kiddush Club to becoming a new member of the Kaddish Club virtually overnight?

How does "She-hakol" get replaced by "Yisgadal v'yiskaddash" in the blink of an eye?

The Tallit

Self-portrait by Aba Bayefsky

By SUSIE PETERSIEL BERG

Cream coloured and rough as the hands of the mother who wove it for her boy to wear before Torah, to daven with his father,
to smudge schoolboy lead and mud into its corners,
it scratched under his clothes when they sent him to safety.
He peeled it off in the new world married his bride beneath it wrapped their first son in it himself.
No last generation,
the next one kept the tallit
refused to bury it beneath a ground already full of souls.
The day that first son stood before Torah
the father wore a new tallit
the son wore his grandfather's davened with his father
smudged pencil and sandlot earth into its corners.
That first son married his bride beneath the grandfather's tallit asked his father to wrap each new child in the softening folds smudged now with ink and tears and sweet wine.
His father died and was wrapped in his own tallit;
the son kept the one that had travelled so far, keened Kaddish graveside ears ringing as dirt hammered wood his own children touched their father's shoulders added their fingerprints to the rough weave.
The day his first child stood before Torah
the father wore a new tallit
the daughter wore her great-grandfather's kissed the worn cloth added the barest trace of lipgloss

An Ode to Meema Chava

By ROSE ROMBERG

A diminutive soft-spoken lady.
Gentle as the whisper in your ear.
Small features, sallow complexion
Never applied makeup.

She worked in a sweatshop
Through self-sacrifice paid for a Schiff's kart to bring Papa to America.

Three l-o-n-g years later
Papa was able to bring Momma and her five little girls to be united with Papa in joyous celebration.

Meema Chava was childless.
In silence, she yearned for her own. In 1925, she inherited five little maidens, her nieces.
Papa & Mama's brood.
Then two more were born,
adding to her joy!
She shared in our lives without reservation –
our twin mother

How she fussed at our forthcoming weddings,
Each of us were showered lavishly.
Each with a chest of silver cutlery.
She was content.

Time after time I remember…
My beloved Meema Chava.
Her visits to the doctor's office
Purple swollen varicose like tiny streamlets running along her legs.
Only her physician knew of her sharp pain, as he injected the needle.
Never a whimper from her lips.

Her silence was like the reading of the "Amidah."
Suffering was her life
Death, was the spring-lock that released her from pain.

I miss her golden presence even after these many decades
Because of her, I, live!

A Link in the Chain

By D.M. TOPP

Retell the story down through the ages,
Recite the wisdom of the sages;
Overeat like it's part of the plan,
Sing a song about a lamb

Sit around the seder plate,
With family 'til the hour is late.
It makes me think about who I am
And where I fit into cosmic plan.
I'm thinking that for hundreds of years
Fellow Jews with hopes, with loves, with fears
Have sat like us on this very date in front of the very same seder plate.

I imagine snippets they might have said,
Conversations echoing in my own head,
Ancestors real as if sitting here,
Gone before me now many a year.

Living in hard times they didn't deserve
When water and wishes were all they could serve,
But still the memory and meaning were kept;
The indelible spirit never slept.
This night will be repeated again,
For I am a link in an unbroken chain;
Generations to come may think of me
As a living part of their ancestry.

I can see our people's will to survive
In spite of those who don't want us alive;
So with pride I recite each familiar word,
A part of our history, always to be heard.

Because of Your Kindness

By ESTHER M. GESSER

Because of Your kindness
I sing!
You have remembered
The assurance to Your servant
For which I hoped.

Best wishes for a Happy & Healthy Passover!

Passover, everyone's favourite holiday

By ELEANOR KUNIGIS MOIDEL

The sparkling white damask tablecloth is freshly ironed, a traditional cloth. The only clue that it had been used before is the small wine stain that didn't come out during the last wash. It, along with everything that sits on the table, is reminiscent of earlier Passovers.

The table is set for 12 people. Along with the gleaming Passover dishes are sterling silver flatware; knives, forks and spoons that are only used during the eight day holiday each year. The matzah cover, embroidered in Lithuania by the now gnarled hands of the great-grandmother, covers the three matzahs.

The crystal maror dish with accompanying spoon is waiting to be filled with homemade horseradish. The afikomen bag, handpainted in kindergarten by the youngest grandchild proudly covers the matzah, to be found later after zeyda hides it.

Crystal wine goblets stand guard at each setting. Each year at least one of the goblets gets broken, only to be replaced before the coming Pesach. And, in the middle of the table humbly sits Elijah's cup, fashioned in silver with Hebrew engraving. It's very old. It has several dents in it, but that doesn't matter because it survived.

It survived the pogrom where many Jews were killed. It survived the ghetto where it was hidden for three years. It survived the turbulent ocean crossing to Canada. It is regarded as the most revered possession of the family.

It trembles as the wine is poured into it. It continues to tremble until the front door is opened to allow Elijah to enter, to join the family while they stare hoping that he will take a sip from the goblet.

> Elijah's cup survived

After he's taken the sip, the children all shout in unison, "We saw him. We saw him. He did take a sip of wine. We saw the level of the wine go down!" The adults smile, nodding in agreement.

The highlight of the night is to sing the songs which appear on the back pages of the Haggadah. The family loves the songs. Sometimes there's an argument about a song as to which melody to sing. The solution is to sing both or all. Why not? Such joy, such nostalgia, such dreaming. Dreams of pace, dreams of shalom, dreams of celebrating the holiday next year. Next year, all together. Next year in warm Jerusalem. Next year in cool, rainy Toronto. As long as the holiday can be celebrated in peace; here and in Israel. B'shana habaa b'Yirushalayim.

Passover Greetings

A Still, Small Voice

By JENNIFER (JINKS) HOFFMANN

And behold, the Lord passed by, and a great and strong wind rent the mountains, and broke the rock in pieces before the Lord: but the Lord was not in the wind: and after the wind an earthquake: but the Lord was not in the earthquake: and after the earthquake a fire: but the Lord was not in the fire: and after the fire, a still, small voice. From Melakhim: First Book of Kings. 19:11-13

all the religions of all the world
teach of the value of silence and of emptiness.
Meditate daily, we are told,
and you will come to your inner nothingness,
where you will find God.
Oh God, I meditate with fervent desire and my nothingness will have nothing to do with me.
Grocery lists, tasks accomplished or those yet to be, thoughts of cheerful or dire nature occupy all the available space when I sit seeking You.

Dearest One can I find Your still, small voice in my everyday life?
When a thought arises to visit my mother-in-law or an ailing friend, is that Your still, small voice?
When I curb my tongue and do not vent my exasperation on the hapless grocery clerk, am I hearing Your still, small voice?
When I give a large tip to a weary looking waitress, am I responding to Your still, small voice?
When I hold my irritation and instead kiss my beloved, do I heed Your still, small voice?
Oh God
is it sufficient to hear Your voice in the still, small moments of my ordinary life?

Happy Passover!

Letter from a Labour Camp

By JOSEPH PERETZ

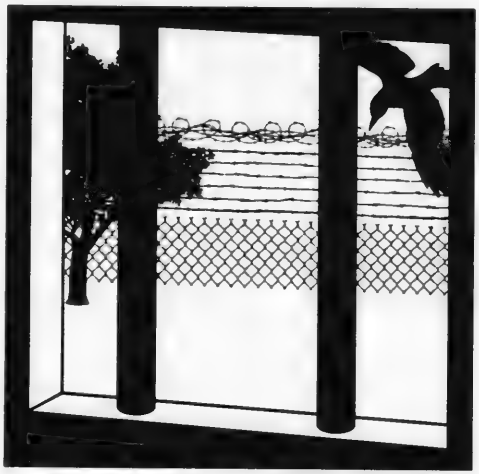

Illustration by Trevor Miller

Sitting on his bunk bed facing the window, pensive, his demeanour is gloomy. He looks out, the water cascading down below the panes. A fine spring rain obscures the sunlight, trying to pierce the grey clouds. Tall, skinny and young, his hair dishevelled, he sighs.

With a tired motion, his right hand travels absent-mindedly through his hair, as if his fingers could dispel his sombre thoughts. A few steps from the wooden barrack wall is the barbed wire he had assisted in putting up since his arrival. A fly walks across the window, its buzz irritating him. He blows to chase it away.

The trees are still bark in the first days of spring. In the distance, the field waits, empty, for the sun to help produce fruit. His gaze envelops this desolate view beyond the barbed wire. He looks at the poles to which the wires are attached to form his prison, the limits of his freedom.

These young trees were dislodged from the woods to be planted here, captive like the prisoners in this camp. He compared them to himself, torn from their kin, excluded from life, from civilization. Why? The answer eludes him.

For months and months he attempts to understand, seeks to know, but it is in vain. The only answer he can come up with is that he suffers because he is what he is. Yes, that must be it. That is the sin he committed. He gets up, leans against his bed, takes a package of tobacco from his pocket, a cigarette paper and automatically rolls a cigarette. Licks the paper, lights up and extinguishes the match with a blow of smoke after having deeply inhaled. The light in his eyes softened a bit, his looks become more vivid. Lucky to still have this to calm his nerves, which dominate him.

What is he thinking of? Could it be his elder parents from whom he has no more news? Of his sister and brother? Is it of his wife he thinks? Who knows if he is married. He looks so young. His eyes moisten, a tear rolls down his cheek. He quickly wipes it off as if he is ashamed and looks at his cigarette with an accusing glance. Then he smiles faintly, looking at the smoke rising from it in a gracious pirouette. One would think that in this design he sees the face of a loved one, a girlfriend maybe, who smiles at him across the barbed wire. A spark of happiness lights up his eyes and ever the dreamer, he looks into the distance, as if he recalls life as it used to be. The freedom, the happiness.

It has stopped raining and through the spreading clouds the sun emits its warm rays. In a tree facing the window, he observes a bird building its nest. He comes and goes, each time holding a straw in its beak, flies around there and lands on a branch he has chosen as his abode for the following summer. With artistic architecture he weaves one straw into another so that each twig contributes to the formation of the nest that will house his family during the coming season. The young man observes this procedure with keen interest. I wonder what ideas cross his mind. Maybe he is daydreaming of the nest he will build for himself once freedom is restored. Probably these are the thoughts that fill his days and nights.

He looks at the bird with envy. How good it is to be free, to encounter no obstacles. No limitations, not to be locked up, no longer to see the cursed barbed wire to be free and live like a human being together with his family, to taste the bliss of marital life. This must be the dream of my imprisoned friend.

A strident whistle blow interrupts my musing.

Suddenly I see my friend rise, exit the barrack at a slow pace. I also get up and follow him. It is time for roll call.

Fires of Hatred

By ANTHONY DAYTON

Hot breath,
Fires of hatred —
Your hatred —
Roaring ever closer.
Fire tongue
Lashing ever nearer.

Your millennia-long
Burning hatred
Dampened momentarily by Holocaust Tears,
When even you
Shamed to hate…
At least overtly.
Crocodile tears,
At best.

And so it
Simmered,
That hatred.
And it
Smoldered,
That hatred.
For half a century,
Within the beast
That is you.

Half a century!
How it must have Galled,
When Jews climbed
From the ghetto,
When they crawled
From the frozen
European mud,

When they rose
From the rivers
Of Auschwitz blood.

How it must have Incensed
When they came Again to life,
When they began
Again to thrive,
When their culture
Once again took root,
Bloomed in soil
Made fertile,
Made holy,
By the sacrifice
Of Jew and Christian both,
When it seemed
We were as one.
Almost.

And all the while,
You watched
In silence livid
You fumed
And all the while
Biding your time.
And now you sense
Your time has come.
Time to unleash
Paroxysm of hate,
Time to spew
Your ancient venom,
Time to incite
The ancient blood,
Your killers,
Your paranoid abhorrence.

Torching synagogues
Is sport again!
Isolating Jews from the world,
What wondrous joy!
A little stoning
While they walk along,
Such satisfying bliss!
And after all,
You waited long for this.
Fan your fires, then,
And once again
Bring destruction
Of all that's good,
And once again,
Bring the desolation
Of the Jews,
But not just the Jew,
You'll again destroy
The other innocents too
From other nations,
And other lands,
It's all as one to you.

There is no cure
For your disease,
For your hellish,
Burning hatred.
There is only
To prepare,
To wait
Where, on the lonely plain
Of Har Megiddo,
There, we know you'll come Again.

My Love

By YONATAN CURRY

I'm in love.

She's a bit older than me, but often seems younger, perhaps in part as a result of her adventurous youth. At other times she displays a wisdom far beyond her years.

Her life has not been easy. She has lived in many countries. Ever mindful of her past she has had to fight for all she has. Through it all she has maintained her sense of self worth and dignity.

Though she has little in material wealth, she lacks for nothing and has achieved a sensible balance between her limited resources and her responsibilities.

Combining her deep and abiding faith with a modern outlook on life she is an exemplary citizen of the modern world.

Though she has no children of her own she is a mother figure to many and is always ready to welcome strangers into her home where they are treated like family.

Culturally we're miles apart, yet her favourite music and simple foods have become my own.

Like most she has her moods; but with a practical disposition brought on by many years of deprivation she is slow to anger. However, her wrath is an awesome thing to behold when aroused.

I feel comfortable when I am with her. Each time I am welcomed with open arms. There is always something new to discover as she slowly reveals herself to me at each meeting.

Happy just to be in her presence, I yearn to know her, to touch and feel her, smell and taste her.

When I'm absent I think about her often. The remembrance of her colours my thoughts and the many actions of my waking days.

A better person for having met her, I would do anything in my power to help her.

Wise beyond her years, yet young at heart, she has captured mine.

Forever, Israel will be my love.

Passover Greetings

Wednesday in April

By DAVID SAUNDERS

It was a Wednesday in April. The morning brought rain and 12:00 to 1:00 was overcast. Then the sun came out, and the temperature went from that of an early spring one to a mid-summer one the way it does in Toronto from time to time.

He returned from the funeral of their good friend and handled it the way he handled all deaths, by hiding himself and being alone. He changed his clothes, those he'd put on to be a pallbearer, suit and tie and white shirt, and put on his jeans, a yellow shirt he'd bought not two months before, one of his many cashmere V-neck sweaters, and told his wife, also grieving, that he was going for a walk, wanted to be alone and didn't want to talk. She'd heard that routine before and try as she might, always felt hurt by it, but talked to herself and got over it.

He put on his navy trench coat, double-breasted, since by late afternoon when he announced his walk, one could predict cool air would return, and it did.

After investigating local bookshops he stopped at a book, magazine, newpaper and confectionery store, what years ago would have been called a cigar store where he picked up a bag of trail mix of nuts and raisins. He figured out how to open it without spilling the contents and munched as he walked. He settled on a long bench in a nearby churchyard where he polished off the mix, scrunched up the bag and with the good aim of a pretty good, but not great athlete, got the two points for tossing it in the receptacle a few feet away.

He returned to the bench, looked down to notice black threads the breeze had caught, blowing when they should've held down a black button. He didn't remember losing the button, and didn't have an extra. It didn't matter, it was at the bottom. He also noticed the salt stain at the hem of his coat, the pearl grey patch that must've attached itself when he brushed by his or his wife's car on a winter day. He knew he should have stayed with khaki when he purchased the coat but they didn't have his size and he needed it then. It couldn't wait.

The funeral was a Jewish service and the man on the bench was a Jew. At graveside, he realized he was the only man there who did not know the Kaddish words. He never learned them or if he did he forgot them when his apostasy commenced or soon afterwards. He felt ashamed. He should not have left his religion behind him; it had much in it and may have even given him something good.

He reflected on his reasons for leaving behind his religion. He'd not told anyone the reasons in decades though he must have told his parents them once at least many decades ago – he'd had to have explained himself to them way back after his Bar Mitzvah. The reasons were two men who scared him.

He was a timid boy, easily frightened, for reasons that may have had to do with his family upbringing or just his nature. He had two Hebrew teachers, both with numbers on their arms, one a Pole, one a German.

The Pole was short, had carrot hair, white skin, eyes that stabbed the air, blue eyes they were; he yelled and shouted at his students and yelled and shouted at the timid boy. More than once he grabbed him by the ear and dragged him up the aisle for no reason other than his own inflammability, for the timid boy would not have done anything so serious as to warrant that punishment. The Pole did the same to Fred, the timid boy's friend, and to Carl and others. The ear drag hurt them all but terrified the boy. He shook in the class for as long as the class lasted, two hours give or take.

The German was stern, wore rimless glasses, and while he never touched the boy, or Fred or Carl, all came to an abrupt attention when he was near. They'd heard bad things about Germans and though this teacher was a German Jew, he was still German, and the youngsters thought they should be fearful, and were.

So after his Bar Mitzvah, the frightened boy told his parents he would not go to classes and would not go to shul, not ever again, and kept to his word. His parents realized how frightened he was of the Pole with carrot hair and of the other man with rimless glasses, and that is why the man did not know the Kaddish words, or if he knew them put them right out of his mind, forever.

Now without faith, without belonging, without even the Kaddish words he was sorrowful, and thought he could change things...it's never too late, they say...but he knew he didn't want to.

He did not comprehend prayer, he thought people prayed when they lost hope, but he also knew that grasping at straws in prayer when all hope is gone is the only rational thing to do. He wondered if his dead friend had prayed. He wondered if at the end of his days he would pray. He didn't know the answer to either.

He sat silent. He had a gift for quiet. He had the trick of quiet, of letting the world flow beneath his eyes.

Passover Greetings

Gratitude to the Just

By FELICITY MAT

Modest in their endeavours
Those who saved human lives

Stand out in the masses
As examples of devotion to ideals and moral values.

Risking their lives
They fought violence, prejudice and cruelty.

They disregarded probable punishment,
Torture and death.

And they won over a mad man's

Proving to the world that Goodness and justice

Cannot fail, cannot pass unnoticed.

Passover Greetings

The Clergy

By STAN WEISBERG

The camp guards
Went home
And made love
To their wives
And kissed
Their children

On the Sabbath Proud in their Uniforms
They went to their Churches and prayed to Their Gods

And the Guards confessed
To their clergy
Of the horrors
They had Witnessed

And they told
Their clergy
Of the gassings
And of the ovens
And many clergy
Were horrified

These clergy
Told the guards
To obey
Their God's Commandment
"Thou Shall Not Murder"

And these clerics
Disappeared Forever
Into the Camps of Death

But other clerics
Told the guards
That they were at war
And could ignore
The commandment
"Thou Shall Not Murder"

And these clerics
Also told
The guards
That they Were all good Christians

And that
The Jews Gypsies
Jehovah Witnesses
Communists and Polish people
They had executed

Were not

And these clerics
Assured the guards
That when they Died they would
All go to Heaven

And that
The Jews Gypsies
Jehovah Witnesses
Communists and Polish people that They had murdered

Would not

But these clerics
And their Guards
Have all Gone to Hell

The leave-taking

By BRUCE D. JACOBS
DAVIDOVITCH

Jacov Abramowicz leaned into a howling Scandinavian Nor'wester. He kicked impatiently at the granite pebbles lining the beach. Whitecaps slapped the shoreline, their distant crests indiscernible against a slate grey Baltic sky. Just inland a dune landscape paralleled the seascape, a glacial remnant of the last ice age.

'Thus it is, thus it ever was,' he considered. Late October on the northern Polish lowlands. Fertile birch woods and neatly rectangular wheat fields flourished further inland during the glory of spring and summer. But now, the land was scoured by winds from the northwest or pummelled by frigid weather generated to the northeast, born of the Arctic pack ice on the Barents Sea.

"Jacov, this year's harvest was insufficient. Hashem has seen fit to shorten the growing season," his wizened father, Shmuley, reflected.

"Some potatoes and turnips, beets and carrots. We'll have to slaughter a few chickens. I was hoping to get some fish from the monger, but he avoids our 'settlement.' And the goyim, those swinia, throw rocks at me if I launch our unseaworthy rowboat and drop a line."

"Papa," replied Jacov sympathetically, "I read in a dated copy of the Warsaw Unzer Yugend, that in places like Ireland, young men are leaving their plots of land and moving to places like America and Canada, even Australia. 'Better small fish than an empty dish,' as the saying goes," Jacov said philosophically.

Shmuley looked fondly at Jakov, understanding fully where this middle son of seven children was going with this unceremonious conversation.

"Look around this village, mein kindila," he responded. "It is a pockmark on a well-worn face. On the outskirts of Mikuszewo, a nothing town on the wrong side of the Wisla estuary. A shtetl with no future. Even the yeshiva struggles to survive."

"Halfway between Gdansk and Biblay. Viershnick. Nowheresville. Two hundred kilometres from civilization either way in Berlin or Warsaw," he chuckled.

"At times in history we're Poles. Then Russians. We could easily, God forbid, become Lithuanians or Germans. Nothing is for certain anymore. Especially with the recent news of pogroms in Bialystok, Kishinev, Kiev and Odessa." It was a sobering litany.

"In my grandfather's time we were Swedes!" They both chortled at the thought.

Father and son stood on the marginally fertile delta, where their river met the Baltic. More clouds billowed westward, elbowed by the late autumn weather front which stretched from the fjords of Norway to the Ural Mountains. The air was rife with particulate matter, churned out from the industrial shipyards and smokestacks of Gdansk. Even in the summer the prevailing winds brought, from the other direction, the rank odour of the chemical plants across the Mewia Lacha (the Seagull Banks), in Kaliningrad.

"Tata," Jacov broke their reverie with one of his many questions. He was a restless, inquisitive young man. "How long has our family been here scratching for food like poultry in the barnyard?" It was a hard question and could have been taken as a great affront to his father, but Shmuley replied patiently and without anger.

"Son, I hear your implied criticism. I'm not insulted, but these are our tender roots. This is my inheritance. A few scrubby acres from my father Moishe, from his father Yussel."

Jacov didn't mind the history lesson that was coming. In fact, it filled him even more with dreams.

"Barbarians traversed this land," Shmuley continued, relishing the opportunity to talk with his son. "Ships sailed the Wistla, probably Viking. Maybe Slavic or Germanic.

"I know you think me a poor schmuck, barely providing. I've done my best to be a good father and husband and Jew."

Jacov was always amazed at his father's humility. There was no hint of anger, grief or guilt. As open as the palm of an outstretched hand.

"No, no. You are the ideal father. It's just that when I look at a summer sky and the horizon is endless, I swear I can see north to the Pole or west to the Atlantic. And I think...there has to be more..."

In the distance, a steamship, likely filled with coal or iron ore for the smelters in the large coastal cities, inched its way across the expanse of churning sea.

"Tata," Jacov continued, encouraged by the way the conversation was going... "I read in some old papers..."

"Oiy, you and those old papers!" Shmuley interjected. "Continue..." he bowed graciously to Jacov.

"Yes, there was this monk from the 1860s in Brno, Czechoslo..."

"Monk?" shrugged his father.

Jacov continued unabashed. "...a few years ago some academic scientists came back to some of his ideas about 'Heredity.' Have you heard of the concept?"

Shmuley stared, simulating a blank look and then said, "Jacov, Rav Glickstein says we must be cautious applying the axioms of modern science to the ancient reality of Torah and Judaism."

For the first time Jacov became irritated, waving his arms, seeking the opportunity to speak.

"Tata, it is a plausible theory... it's 1906 and this kind of thinking..." he trailed off under the open but serious gaze of his father.

"Rav Glickstein says this kind of thinking needs deep discussion from the rabbis in the Warsaw congregations. You're referring to genetics, yes? I also read that old newspaper," he chortled.

Pier 21 in Halifax.

"So you understand, or at least you know what I'm speaking of. Genetics, Tata. Why else would Sara and Mendel have blond curly locks while the five of us have straight dark brown hair?" Jacov was excited that he now had some common ground for discussion.

"Zaide Abramowicz had flaming orange hair and Aunt Esther had the blue-green eyes of a Dane!" exclaimed Jacov.

Nearby, a large, scruffy dog yelped at the seagulls as they landed on the beach, scrounging for marine life left high and dry by the tide.

"That one has been chased out of its home by our neighbours. Untrainable they say. Now it's living vildechai...like wildlife. At night it howls at the moon," his father lamented. "Sounds like a Siberian wolf, but look; it has a tail like a German Weimariner and a massive head like a Saint Bernard...but a beard like a Schnauzer. I suppose you'll argue that supports your 'genetics theory,' my son?"

Shmuley made it sound as if he was yielding on a point of Talmudic debate.

Jacov looked admiringly at his father. He was not a rich man, nor an educated one. Yet he had raised seven offspring and survived life's hardships with humility, at the cost of losing three infants and a first wife to childbirth.

"I have something to tell you," Shmuley stated in a confidential tone, somewhat comically as there was no one else around for miles except the hound and the gulls.

"Aha, Tata, so you're not just standing here enjoying the tropical panorama spread before us," chided Jacov.

"No wise-guy, my Mr. Man-In-The-Middle," Shmuley responded affectionately. Suddenly, his father's tone changed.

"You won't remember because you were very young, but one Pesach seder about 15 years ago, my eldest brother, Baruch, brought a gentile woman to your grandfather's home. A Finn from across the sea. A beautiful, tall shiksa he had met while in the Merchant Marine."

The wind had died down and it was so still you could hear the last of the poplar leaves fluttering to the ground. Jacov listened intently.

"It was a tragedy for all but an insult of the most heinous kind to my father. An embarrassment to all present. But that was the headstrong way Baruch did things. To the horror of all present, he announced his intention to marry and move away to Helsinki." Shmuley's voice grew painfully soft.

Jacov looked down at the stones speechless, listening to his father's uneasy breathing. The breeze picked up, fluttering his tzitzis and tugging at their kippot.

"They were both prideful men, your grandfather and my brother. No negotiation and no diplomacy. Tradition and modernity. Like two alpha male bull stags locking antlers in the forest."

Somewhat impatient now, Jacov asked, "Tata, what does this have to do with me? I barely remember Uncle Baruch except for his argumentative nature. And the horizon I seek is not across the Baltic!"

"Yes, son, I recognize that, but please, let me continue."

"Certainly Tata." Jacov backed down a notch.

"It ended badly, as it was destined to. The confrontation was awful. Angry lips, once loosened, spewed words like lava from a breach in a volcano. Neither would back down. It was a conflagration! It ended with your uncle storming out professing his undying love for the Helsinki girl and his distaste for his family and background."

Shmuley staggered slightly, remembering the terrible night years ago. Jacov steadied him and waited for his father to go on.

"Awful, primitive stuff. My father yelling in public declaration: 'By this rent of cloth you are dead to the family,' tearing a piece of the material from the collar of his jacket.

"And now its been all these years without even a word from my brother...and my father, bless his memory, is long gone. It seems as if it was all for nothing," he said, his voice trailing off sorrowfully.

Waiting a respectful moment, Jacov began to speak in earnest.

"Tata, I need to leave Poland. I want to go to America. Be a scientist. This shoreline is like a fence to keep us in." He spread his arms to indicate the physical limitations of his existence.

"There are big changes happening in this new century and I want to be part of them.

"I need to know I have your blessing. I don't want to be like your father or brother in your eyes." Jacov stared directly into his father's eyes.

Both stood, eyes shining with tears, holding back but not crying. Man-to-man they stood at a precipice of decision. His father nodded.

"There is so much beyond our life here. This generation is so different from the previous one. I can't say no, Jacov. That would be unkind of me. And your older brothers, should they stay, will need to make a living from this land. I understood from the beginning when you spoke of the sons of Ireland and other countries and why they were leaving," he smiled coyly at Jacov.

"Ahhh, Tata, you are a learned man!"

"Well, let's call it experienced," Shmuley responded. "I'm not yet ready to lead the congregation," he mused.

Arm in arm they trod slowly back to their home. Later, by the light of an oil lamp, his father brought out his favourite book, the old Machzor; the High Holiday Prayer Book. Whether Rosh Hashanah or Pesach, he often turned to it to find comfort.

Part of Jacov's wanderlust was the questioning of all around him, but that would be an unfair judgement of all his father held important.

"Son," his father said, as if reading Jacov's thoughts, "This book of prayers, old and stained with tears," he quoted from memory.

"To bear all their sorrow and degradation,"... It was too poignant, too sad.

Jacov's quandries were not the woes of the ancients crying out for a 'protecting shield.' The promise of a new life thrilled him, but he was a respectful son and had clearly absorbed the message of his father's story about his uncle.

Not long thereafter the family saw Jacov off on his journey. On foot to Mikuszewo, by wagon to Gdansk, several trains to Amsterdam, finally by ship crossing to Halifax, not unlike 100,000 others from a thousand different points of embarkation.

A massive wave carrying a new generation of humanity, to the promising horizons beyond their loved, lost but not forgotten worlds.

Hands

By MAURICE KRYSTAL

It was in Gdansk that I discovered the Yad. It is a ritualistic pointer in the shape of a small hand that Jews use when they read the text in the Torah. The purpose is to prevent the reader from actually touching the sacred parchment. It is usually made of silver, about a foot long, and has a chain that allows it to be hung on the Torah handles.

I had just finished a tour of the 13th century Malbork Castle, the largest castle in the world made solely of bricks, and saw a large crowd milling about in the nearby square. It was some sort of flea market, with dozens of booths selling old furniture, paintings, clocks and books. Near the end of one row was a stall with some flags. I was surprised to see some bearing the Nazi swastika.

I walked hesitantly towards the stand. Two men and a woman were behind the two tables. The men wore black leather jackets and pants. Their heads were shaved and gleamed in the bright sunlight. The woman wore a yellow Solidarity T-shirt and a black leather skirt with high black boots. As a Jew I was revolted and yet I felt as if a magnet were pulling me towards them.

I saw on one table Nazi medals, daggers, breastplates, army badges and helmets neatly arranged. On the other table there were revolvers, rifles and ammunition. My Polish was limited but I understood most of the information written on the cards placed next to the various objects for sale.

The men eyed me as they smoked their cigarettes. I saw a tattoo on the neck of one of the men. It was a jagged double SS. I could feel my heartbeat increase in my chest. Suddenly the woman pushed the arranged rifles into a pile, lifted a large cardboard box from the floor and placed it on the newly cleared space. The box was labeled in Polish with a red felt marker that said "Jew Stuff."

I struggled to control my pace and breathing as I made my way towards her and the box. I watched her reach into the cardboard box and take out a silver spice box and a small silver chalice that were probably part of a Havdalah set. Her fingers, and even her thumbs, were covered in rings bearing Nazi insignia. The box contained armbands, cloth Stars of David, as well as mezuzot and bits of leather that looked like phylacteries. And then I saw the small silver hand of the Yad pointing heavenward.

"How much?" I asked in Polish as I pointed to the box.

She smirked and continued to remove objects from the box and place them near the rifles. One of the men threw down his cigarette and moved towards me.

"Everything in silver is 200 Zlotys. Everything else is 50."

Two hundred Zlotys was about $85 US. I held the Yad in my hand. It was surprisingly heavy and it looked old. I had no idea if was genuine. I had been warned that tourists were often scammed.

As if he read my mind, he grinned.

"Farmers in the area find this stuff in their fields and sell it to us."

The Yad was badly tarnished, and the chain was broken and tied into a knot to hold the remaining links in place. Yet in its dishevelment it remained majestic. I knew I had to pay the ransom to get it out of this place.

"You take American money?" I asked.

"Sure," he said switching to a heavy accented English.

He took the Yad from me and hefted it in one hand.

"Got to be about three pounds of silver," he said looking at me with narrowing dark eyes. "You like Jewish silver?" He grinned and added, "A hundred and twenty American dollars is a real steal!"

I wasn't going to argue with his math. I hated him but I didn't want to jeopardize this rescue mission. I swallowed hard, paid the man and put the Yad in my inner jacket pocket, close to my heart.

I returned to Montreal the day before my father's yahrzeit, the anniversary of his death, and lit a candle in his memory. As I stared at the flickering flame and the nearby Yad on the dining room table I realized it was 15 years since I said goodbye to him at the Jewish General Hospital.

I had held his hand as his breathing became more laboured. After dozens of strokes in a few months, most of the left side of his body had become paralyzed. So I held his smooth and soft right hand. When I squeezed he would weakly respond. As I sat with him in the darkened room I remembered his hands being so different.

I remembered being young and my little hand felt small in his large calloused grip as we went together to shul. I felt safe. I recalled him teaching me to assist in carpentry. He would cut with the saw while I blew away the sawdust so he could follow the pencil line. Every once in awhile I squeezed some drops of oil on the blade. Then, before the job was almost done, he allowed me to grip the blade handle, while he covered my hand with his, and together we would saw the last inch of wood.

He loved to draw and paint and he would put a pencil in my hand and I would mimic his motions, and that was how he taught me art. He was self-taught and I learned later his paintings were classified as naive or innocent art, but I proudly hung them on my walls when he passed away.

I had asked the art dealer who was going to clean and repair the Yad to try to find the history behind this piece. From two small markings on the base he was able to discover that an early 17th century silversmith in the city of Cracow created it. As I held it I fantasized about the thousands of other hands that held this instrument the past four centuries.

They must have been the rich and poor, merchants and scholars, capitalists and socialists, the very pious and the secular. So different yet they were all readers of the Torah. I imagined the panic that must have ensued as the Nazis invaded Poland in '39. How did this Yad find its way to some farmer's field near Gdansk?

I must have fallen asleep. The hospital room was dark and I became conscious I was still holding my father's hand. I squeezed gently but there was no response. Maybe he had fallen asleep, but then I realized his hand was chilled. I turned on the light at the head of his bed and saw his eyes were wide open. I touched his cheek and felt the coldness. I kissed his forehead before going to the nurses' station.

On my father's next yahrzeit I took the Yad to my father's old shul and gave it as a gift in his name. The rabbi seemed pleased and smiled when I told him its history and how it was rescued. That night, in a dream, I felt my father's hand squeeze mine.

God's mercy

By APRIL LAUFER

His face was smooth. There was not even a measure of stubble. Having taken his razor carefully, slowly attending to the corners of his chin, the sides of his face, he had spent several minutes in his morning routine. Feeling the weight of his razor in his fingers, watching in the mirror as he scraped the foam off his skin. The face that looked back at him made him sigh. He saw only his sadness; there was fear in that face. It made him look older than his 59 years.

As he left the house that morning his head bent forward as if in a perpetual nod; it was clear that he had no self consciousness, no desire to pretend his height. The corners of his mouth were drawn downward in a frown that suggested some long sorrow. On his head, a cap that covered his forehead and exaggerated the appearance that his eyelids sat heavily over his eyes.

He was angry. "How could He let people suffer like this?" he asked. It was a question that he could not let go of. It did not make sense. So much suffering, so much pain, so much agony. So much. Surely no one deserved to suffer. Even if perhaps a person had committed some egregious sin, surely suffering did not make anything right, did not change what had been. And what if there was no guilt, no blame, no sin? He argued all these things, with himself.

He had been working out his feelings now for months. He had tried to look for another alternative but no matter how many times and no matter how many different ways he looked at the situation, there was only a single answer.

He had made his decision. He understood what it was that he had to do. He had first and only to justify it to himself.

To anyone who was willing to listen, he told his sad story. His wife, the best wife in the world, the heart of kindness, and generosity, the spirit of an eyshet hayil, the one who could wake up in the morning and say thank God, and abei gesundst, let things be well, this wife, who could smile, she was finished, gemucht. She was dying. Slowly.

Such suffering.

"I do not have her courage, her fortitude," he shook his head. "I do not know how she can still smile and welcome the day. It isn't right. It does not make sense that such suffering exists." His wife! What did she ever do to suffer so?

Nobody argued with him. Nobody said that he was wrong to feel the things he felt. Nobody contradicted him. Nobody suggested to him that he should pray harder.

And of course, that question. The one that would not be answered. "What about the one million children? Where was God? Suffering isn't right. Even if the parents, maybe the adults had done something; not the children."

What answer could there be?

God was sleeping?

Hiding?

"Not this type of suffering," he said, shaking his head slowly, closing his eyes as he said it, his face registering his despair.

And really what was he talking about? Did God have to justify the suffering of his wife? He could not believe that his God, the God to whom he had prayed these past many years, in fact all his life from before his Bar Mitzvah until now, that God, the one who is merciful…

Merciful. That gave him pause. God as merciful.

Had his younger cousin not sneered at that comment when they were together last Pesach? He had been angry with him then. Not at the comment but at the laid-back way the young man had thrown the comment out, as if it was an exclamation point; as if there were no counter-argument.

"God as merciful. Right, that explains all the wars and the killing that the Jews did." He had been angry with that comment, the glibness of it. At the time he had wanted to answer the mocking tone of his cousin with some wisdom of his own. The young man's words seemed to hang in the air and sadly, at least for him, they seemed to diminish the evening's rituals.

The table had been set in a picture perfect Passover tableau — the shining glassware, the dishes, the silver cutlery, the shmura matzah, the bottles of wine. Why had this cousin come if he didn't believe?

But then he looked around the table and wondered who did believe. Who of his guests cared? Oh yes, the older guests, the older cousins and aunts, and grandparents. He didn't pause to wonder if they believed.

But he wondered about the younger guests, the younger ones who came out of obligation, of filial responsibility or perhaps, just because they got to see their cousins on this occasion. Oh, and maybe for the food. There was always plenty of food.

He could still feel the anger that he had felt last Pesach, anger toward the young man with his easy dismissal of the ritual and the meaning of it. Didn't it have to have meaning beyond the social? Didn't his prayers have to have meaning beyond the mouthing of them, didn't his prayers mean something?

As he remembered the emotions that had risen up inside him from some place that wasn't his own, some historical time line that he thought he had committed himself to perpetuating, as he remembered those feelings he wanted to be that person again. The one who had always prayed to Hashem, the one who believed.

He could picture the crowd at the Passover table. All family. His family. All so different. And he remembered how content he had been and then the shock he had felt by the abruptness of the young cousin's comments. What he had really wanted to do was talk to him. To tell him that we can not take the world for granted. To tell him that things were not perfect, that man was not perfect but that to be here, to be able to sit in freedom and to remember that there was a time when Jews were only slaves, were only allowed to work under the gaze of taskmasters. What he had really wanted to say is don't be so glib. Don't think that you know all the answers. Don't think that God performs his acts of mercy according to some limited human's understanding.

He had wished that he had been sitting next to the cousin. Then he could have spoken to him quietly, confidentially. Not that he would have said anything confidential. He would have talked about life's miracles, and wonders. He would have spoken of the wonders of the Jewish state, of Jewish life in the modern century, of the accomplishments of Jews in the world, their participation in the world. Yes, there were still those who hated the Jews, but there would always be those.

He would have quietly spoken about mercies in life that we little human beings could not possibly understand. Can mere human beings possibly fathom how great and wondrous the world really is?

We, he would have said, we who think we know so much about the universe. We are but a speck.

And would his young cousin have listened? And would he really have said any of those things?

And now as he puzzled over his anger, and despaired at his own doubts, he wondered what he was supposed to do.

And again he tried to imagine the conversation that he had ruminated over. His cousin that had sneered at God's wonders: then, at that time, he had had a response, at least in his mind.

If you reject this God who brought our ancestors out of Egypt, don't you see that you would not be sitting here at this table this night? Don't you see that you would not be able to drink the wine and spill those drops in memory of that long ago time? No, it has not been perfect. And it was true that Egyptians suffered the plagues. And were washed away in the Red Sea. You say this is not merciful? That is not merciful? And the hundreds of years of slavery under Egyptian taskmasters? And the death of Jewish children in the Nile? Of that you do not act incensed? No of course, one evil does not make another palatable. Not for you who were not suffering, not for you who were not there. Not for you. But please listen to everything. It is so easy to focus on one aspect and demand only justice and mercy. But where in this entire universe of mankind does such a thing exist? Only justice? Only mercy?

And that is why these attributes are God's. That is why we must strive in, however an imperfect way, we must strive. Do not condemn this God of mercy because he has not been perfect in your sight or in mine.

It is because of that time that we are able to sit here this night and you are able to ask your questions. You have the right to ask questions even of God. But if you ask, then you must listen. Not in some filtered way, hearing only what you believe to be true but to listen to everything. To understand the narrative but also understand the questions, understand the discussion. Why do we care whether Rabbi Jose Hagalil agrees with Rabbi Eliezer or Rabbi Akiba? Why discuss the meaning of the crossing of the Red Sea? Not to dwell on the harm done to the Egyptians but to understand the greatness of the miracle of the Jews leaving Egypt.

What he had wanted to say is not everything is perfect.

But we are sitting here this night not because of the food or rote repetition of the Passover story, but because we are free and because we are Jews we are given another opportunity to become engaged in our faith. This night it is possible to suspend our cynical views of the world and believe in miracles. Not because we Jews are better or our God is better, perfect in His mercy, but because it is our faith that has sustained us. It is our faith that that has brought us here tonight.

He had wanted to be able to say all of that and instead he had found himself embarrassed to respond to the young man. Now he wondered if there was some truth to the words that had been hurled into the air?

Who really believed? Could he still believe? Tears came to his eyes, unbidden, again.

He hated those tears. The ones he would not allow in front of his wife.

Did God see his tears? And if He did why didn't he answer them?

But then God had not answered the tears of the one million? Or of their mothers and fathers and grandparents and and and...

What was happening to him? Was he, too, as cynical as his younger cousin? Perhaps he was even more of an apicorus. The younger cousin had been mocking in his comments, but perhaps had never believed. But he had. He had always believed in God. And now, because of his own pain, his own personal sorrow, he could not see God's mercy.

God's mercy.

He wept into his handkerchief. Standing in line at the bank. He wept.

He did not care who saw him.

Sky Blue Eyes

By SUZANNE REISLER LITWIN

He has blue, blue eyes
The colour of the so very high sky, blue kind of eyes.

And a heart that can wrap around the world
So warm, so kind, so fine and so mine.

His hands are perfect and smooth, soft to touch, strong in hold, playful and skilled. Fitted perfectly to my mold.

A gentleman, a kind man, a good man, a man's man, the best Father man of all the man, I know.

His sweet smelling manly musk, dry cleaned and swooned, with such pride of the pack, a delicious man, in fact.

Lover of flowers, arts, beauty, our people, the chief of our homes, our lives that we all shared. He cared so much.

Come celebrate with me, he said, dance on my head, around, around until I'm unabound. Let's play a game, if you dare, it was fun, it had flair.

And so....

Quiet is now, and the time has been stilled. Peace encompasses the earth that is so near. You are one with the world, my darling dear.

Did I mention the blue, the very blue eyes? Just look up and you will see them very high, high, high into the sky.

Bar Mitzvah Memories

By JUDITH WEINRYB

"It couldn't have been a more perfect affair. Don't you agree, honey?" Doris Adler said as she washed down a piece of black forest cake with a mug of hot, Irish coffee. She looked up from her plate at her husband David with a look of intense satisfaction. Her son Noah's bar mitzvah was, as far as she was concerned, a colossal success. Everyone seemed to agree, even Uncle Sol from Detroit who usually complained about everything. Her 10 months of party planning had paid off, and much to her delight, her synagogue had opened its newly redesigned ballroom just in time.

Noah, on the other hand, was not nearly as excited about the affair as his mother. Disinterested in both karaoke and line dancing, he found himself sitting alone at the head table, thinking about his late grandfather, affectionately known to him as Zaidy Sam. He recalled the walks they used to take through Kensington Market, along College Street and then up Major Street to his house, where they would enjoy a cup of tea and rugelach in the living room with Bubbie Sara.

They used to share their thoughts on just about everything. Sometimes Zaidy would discuss intricate concepts in the Talmud that flew way over Noah's head, yet it had made no difference to him that he could not understand them. The fact that Zaidy shared his pearls of wisdom with him was all that really mattered. Sadly, his grandfather had died just six months after Bubbie Sara of what must have been a broken heart, so he could not be present today.

After reflecting on his memories, Noah felt that he needed a break from the party and decided to go for a stroll. Leaving the ballroom, he walked through the glass-enclosed atrium garden towards the newly dedicated Freedman Memorial Chapel. He paused to admire the tree of life engraved with the names of families that had belonged to the synagogue over the years, then continued down the hall until he reached the entrance to the Epstein Family Judaica Museum. Finding the door unlocked, Noah decided to take a peek inside.

Turning on the lights, he was struck by the silence in the room. He noticed faded black and white photographs, carefully framed and hung in even rows along the bright, white walls and wondered what could possibly interest him in these seemingly ancient relics from the past. His grandfather had been a member of the congregation when he had arrived in Toronto from England as a child in the 1930s. Perhaps, thought Noah, he might find him in some of the photographs. He began to examine them, hoping to see a familiar face in the shots of the brotherhood meetings and the annual picnic at Christie Pitts Park.

As he moved from photograph to photograph, Noah found himself looking at group portraits. The more he studied them, the more the subjects began to resemble one another, standing as they did in formal poses, sometimes smiling, at other times appearing quite serious. Were they unhappy, he wondered, or did the photographer just tell them not to smile? It was hard to tell.

Noah had just spent the entire morning being photographed with his parents and aunts and uncles, encouraging him to smile over and over again. He recalled how the photographer had struggled to get everyone into the right position when his baby brother Jonathan ran screaming into the first row and nearly knocked Aunt Hilda off her chair. Jonathan would likely be reminded of that moment for years to come. Still, it had been a welcome break for Noah as he had grown quite tired of having his picture taken.

"I know how you feel," Noah said quietly to a boy in one of the photographs, as though he could hear his words.

Seconds later, he heard a voice whisper "I believe that you do." Startled, he turned towards a door that was slightly opened just behind him.

"Is anyone there?" Noah asked.

"I'm over here, behind the door," the voice responded. "Were you sent to help me carry the herring jars? I'm so glad you're here. They are really quite heavy."

As Noah walked through the door, he noticed that the air in the room was musty like in a damp basement, a startling change from the cool, filtered air in the museum. It was dark except for a dim light provided by a small kerosene lamp overhead.

Suddenly, a boy about his age emerged from behind some shelves. He seemed pleased to see Noah and handed him a jar. Dressed in a plain white shirt and brown corduroy pants, he had a wool cap on his head like something a klezmer musician might wear. It was obvious to Noah that he had stumbled upon a rehearsal for the upcoming play about the history of the synagogue and recalled seeing the poster for it in the main lobby earlier.

"Come," the boy called out as he sped across the floor. "Bring the herring and grab a couple of loaves from the bread basket next to you." As he spoke, he was running up a narrow staircase that led to a heavy looking iron door at the top. "Hurry. There is no time to waste. Rabbi Turner is waiting to make Kiddush."

As the door opened, Noah was dazzled by the brightness of the light streaming towards him and could hardly see where he was going. He soon found himself in a long, narrow room with large windows in the centre that welcomed the sunshine that flooded inside.

Noah took a good look around. In the centre of the room he saw a long table covered by a white lace tablecloth and adorned with baskets of daisies and petunias. A large covered pot with a ladle and wooden bowls were placed in the centre, and a pitcher of water and a bottle of wine sat at either end. In a far corner, some men were studying texts that lay open on a small wooden desk.

"Shmuel," one of them called out impatiently to the boy, "have you seen Mrs. Cohen? She is supposed to bring a sponge cake and should have been here by now." Just then, a matronly woman hurried into the room carrying a tray filled with cookies and a plain lemon-coloured cake.

"So sorry, I'm late," she muttered as she placed the tray on the table. She was followed into the room by a younger woman wearing a blue cotton dress and a large straw hat, covered with the same assortment of flowers that were on the table. She was holding on tightly to the hand of a curly-haired redheaded girl, who was jumping up and down and appeared to be ready to take off the second the woman let go.

"Freidl, gather the children from the garden," she commanded the girl, who began running towards a door leading outside. "Rabbi Turner would like to make Kiddush and we want to serve the cholent while it is still hot." She spoke with authority, Noah noticed, in a British accent that gave her an almost regal air. Turning to Shmuel, she smiled at him and said in a gentler tone, "I'm so proud of you, my dear son. How I wish your father could be here with us today. He would be so very proud too." She kissed him on the cheek and patted him lovingly on the head before taking her place next to Mrs. Cohen at the table.

At that precise moment, a tall bearded gentleman entered the room, accompanied by what appeared to be an entourage of followers. They were involved in an animated discussion.

"So you see," the gentleman was saying emphatically, "man's free will is a gift from HaShem, a gift we must cherish and never abuse. This week's parshah clearly demonstrates this to us." As he sat down near the table, he shifted his focus from his talmudic argument to the events at hand, redirecting his attention to the bar mitzvah boy and the guests who were waiting for the Kiddush to be performed.

"All right then, Shmuel," he began slowly, placing his hand firmly on his shoulder. "We will now join together to celebrate the immensely joyous occasion of your entrance into manhood." He cleared his throat and continued. "The members of the Londoner Shul welcome you and your family to our small but caring spiritual home."

Looking at Shmuel's mother's beaming face, he added "Soon, Mrs. Adler, your husband will be coming from England to join you. We hope and pray that your entire family will be blessed with a good life here in the friendly community of Toronto."

Noah was astonished to hear his family name, but decided that this was just a coincidence. After all, Adler was not an uncommon name in the Anglo-Jewish community.

After Rabbi Turner recited Kiddush, Mrs. Cohen distributed glasses of wine to everyone. She then uncovered the pot on the table, and began scooping cholent into bowls. Soon the Rabbi began to sing, and within seconds, the others joined in. "Siman Tov and Mazel Tov and Mazel Tov and Siman Tov," reverberated in the room as the voices grew louder and louder. The men were leaping about, their arms intertwined as they circled Shmuel and lifted him exuberantly up from the floor on a chair. Noah stared at the scene, amazed at how much energy there was around him. Then he felt a hand tapping him on the shoulder.

"Some cholent?" Mrs. Cohen asked. Noah declined politely, as he was still quite full from dinner, then asked "I was wondering, Mrs. Cohen, do you enjoy being in the play? It really does look like fun."

Mrs. Cohen stared at him as though she did not know what to say. Noah imagined she had not heard his question because of the boisterous singing. As he turned back to watch the festivities, he realized that he was so entranced by them that he had forgotten about his own bar mitzvah celebration. Glancing at his watch, he decided that it was time to return there and quietly slipped out the door so he would not disturb the rehearsal. After going back downstairs to the cellar and returning to the Judaica Museum, Noah noticed a glass-enclosed display case containing a burgundy velvet-covered siddur standing near the main entrance. It was opened to the first page. Leaning over to look at it, he read the inscription.

It said, "Presented to Shmuel Adler in honour of his Bar Mitzvah by Rabbi Moshe Turner on May 31, 1932." Astonished, he looked back toward the entrance to the cellar. There was now only a wall where the door had been, with a single portrait in the centre. Incredulous, he ran over to have a closer look. His heart was racing. He could not believe his eyes.

In front of him was a painting of Rabbi Turner smiling and looking directly into his eyes as if to say "I welcome you into our community as I did your grandfather many years ago."

Of course he did not actually speak to him, but Noah could hear his words nonetheless.

My 'Fetter Symche Binem' from Zychlin

By WOLF BRONET

I had many uncles in Warsaw, Poland, where I was born in March 1924. There was Uncle Label, Ellil, Leshiek, Yankel and many others from both sides of the family, but there was no one like my Fetter Symche Binem from Zychlin. He was as colourful as any character in my life, and I have seen them all.

Fetter Symche Binem was a brother to my mother, Ruchel Laya Makower. She had four more brothers, but all four immigrated to the United States. Actually, she was the first one to emigrate to the US because her fiancée from Zychlin, who already resided in America, sent her a ticket, but her martens, my grandparents, Mendel Yosef Makower and my bubbeh Iskeh Ash decided not to send their only daughter to America because there were rumours that in America, some individuals were selling the girls for white slavery. Instead they sent her brother, Uncle Abe, on the ticket that was actually meant for my mother.

From 1880 to 1900, all the other brothers except Symche Binem went to the United States. In the meantime, my mother, Ruchel Laya, married Moshe Bronet from Warsaw. They lived at 21 Franciskansha, Apartment 77. We had two rooms on the third floor in the second courtyard. There was a huge kitchen and a double parlour, which consisted of a dining room and bedroom. We had running water, gas, electricity and toilet facilities within this house.

We were poor, I was the youngest of six children. There were many times that I would leave for school without any food in my stomach. I would wait until my sister Adele, who was a Warsaw university student, would bring me something to eat. I was always glad to see her. On other occasions, she would come to see my teacher because I was constantly getting into trouble. She was able to communicate with my teacher better than my parents. I was always so proud of her. There were very few Jewish girls who attended university in those days. She always brought home with her some goodies.

> "My uncle resembled Tevia"

Fetter Symche Binem made trips twice a week from Zychlin, which was approximately 140 kilometres from Warsaw. My uncle's main purpose was to buy merchandise for storekeepers in his shtetl. He received a commission from them when he brought them these goods. I used to assist him with the dooshke (horse and buggy), making sure nobody stole the wares while he was negotiating with merchants. For a youngster between nine and 12 years of age, it was quite an accomplishment. To me, this was a holiday. I became "street smart" and knew all the places on Nalewki Gesia and Franciskansha. Uncle Symche Binem bought me lunch at a restaurant, feeding me goodies throughout our daily excursions.

My uncle must have been about 40 years old. He very much resembled Tevia from Fiddler on the Roof. Sporting a long capotteh with tzitzis hanging out, he was constantly in a hurry, rushing to catch the train at the Central Station in Warsaw at the last minute. Huffing and puffing like the locomotive, he broke into a sweat just as the train began to pull away. Luckily, I was there to help him load the parcels. Since he never had time to buy tickets in advance of departure, he chose to hide in the bathroom or bribe the conductor of the train.

On his second trip, which was generally on Fridays, he shipped eggs or chickens to Warsaw. With his luck, when eggs were brought to the market, the price dropped and the merchants wanted chickens, so he ended up losing money. When he brought chickens, the prices were also down and he lost money again. We wonder how he was able to remain in business.

His brothers in America sent him $50 US every month to support his parents and family. His monthly allowance from his brothers in the United States helped subsidize his losses.

Let me tell you about his wife "Cocia" Auntie Esther. My Aunt Esther always acted as the matchmaker within our family.

There were many children of all ages in our family, from first and second marriages. Yankel, Ruchel, Moshe, Favish, Iske, Chaikeh, Blumeh and as I recall there was always a baby swinging in a cradle. I always enjoyed rocking the baby when visiting Zychlin. There was also Wolf and Chaikeh, Sam and Blumeh, Henry and Ruchel, etc.

Sometimes Uncle Symche Binem stayed overnight for Shabbat at our home. He would take me to the mikveh, a ritual bath with a little pool of hot running water where men would dip several times to wash away their sins.

When we returned home, before going to sleep, he used to hang up his killeh bendel (jock strap) on the chair beside his bed. As a child, I used to visit the theatre that showed silent western movies with Tom Mix, Gene Autrey, William Desmon and Roy Rogers. They wore gun holsters, which looked like my uncle's killeh bendel. I used to put it on and pretend that I was a cowboy.

On several occasions, he would take me to Zychlin for a few days during the summer months when there was no school. I accompanied the older children to the farm to purchase the eggs and chickens so that Uncle could bring them to the market in Warsaw. It was a lot fun.

Friday nights in Zychlin, the house was spic and span. The children were all dressed up in their Shabbat attire. Uncle Symche Binem wore his shining black capoteh. The floors were sprinkled with sawdust and many Shabbat candles were lit, creating a festive atmosphere. Bubbeh Iskeh, Zaideh Mendel Yosef, Auntie Esther and the children all waited anxiously for Fetter Symche Binem to come from the shtibel (a tiny synagogue). Nobody was allowed to touch anything until Uncle would make Kiddush.

The story was that Bubbeh Iskeh, before she retired for the night, had hidden a couple of bottles of beer under her pillow along with our five raw eggs, which she consumed as a nightcap.

I will never forget my "Fetter Symche Binem" from Zychlin.

Passover Greetings

In simple terms

By ELEANOR KUNIGIS MOIDEL

During the time of shtetl life in Eastern Europe, the Jewish people lived in constant fear of yet another pogrom, of yet another blood libel, of yet another kidnapping of youngsters to serve in the Russian army.

And then Hitler came. He wanted to annihilate the Jews from the face of the earth because they were the root of all evil. They are what caused Germany to lose World War I. They had to be eradicated so that the world would not have to suffer their takeover of the world economy. They were accused of aiding and abetting all the money lenders. It was their fault that Germany didn't have enough food to feed their citizens. The Jews were to be blamed for every ill that befell Germany.

Luckily, Hitler didn't fully succeed. In 1948 the Jews finally had a nation that was theirs. So what were the anti-Semites to do? Waging war on Israel became the enemies' modus operendi. And of course Israel was to be blamed for everything that had gone wrong in the Middle East.

At first the surrounding nations didn't openly say that they wanted Israel wiped off the map, that the Israeli inhabitants should be thrown into the sea. That came later. Israel prevailed. The Israelis had to fight constant wars. When that didn't accomplish the diabolical plan of Israel's enemies, the citizens of Israel were then subjected to missile attacks, unprovoked bombings of schools, buses and houses, as well as slander.

When it became apparent that Israel would not surrender, the anti-Semites developed a new slogan. We are not against Jews, we are against Israelis, we are against Zionists and Zionism.

While the anti-Semites were spewing forth these volatile orations, Jewish cemetery monuments were overturned, often smeared with swastikas and hate messages. Schools and synagogues were vandalized, cars in Jewish neighbourhoods were overturned. These occurrences took place all over Europe, North and South America, Australia and South Africa, wherever Jews live in Jewish communities. These Jews do not live in Israel. They are not Israelis. Yet the anti-Semites continue to slander and malign the Jews with their hate messages while saying they are not against Jews, just Israel and its inhabitants.

And when Israel is the first to come to the rescue of people whose lives have been shattered by natural disasters, as in Haiti, the media tries very hard to keep the good deeds quiet. Why? Are they afraid of anti-Semitic backlash or is the media anti-Semitic as well? When Rwanda needed help, Israel was one of the first to respond. When Darfur needed and continues to need assistance, Israel was and is there.

One would think that Israel would be worn down by now, would be reluctant to come to anyone's assistance. The opposite seems to be true. People can count on Israel to be there when the need arises. But who is there for Israel when its children are attacked and bombed and burned alive? What is wrong with Israel? Why don't they keep a lower profile?

The answer is there for all to see. The Israelis follow the teachings of their parents, who learned it from their parents. It is incumbent for each individual to help another. In the case of disasters, we must come to the aid of the victims. In personal relationships with friends and neighbours, we have to remember to help where we can. What do the haters of Israel follow? What are their laws? What is their rhetoric? What do they believe in?

Israel doesn't even consider themselves heroes in coming to Haiti to help in the way that they did. They do what has been ingrained in every Jew since birth. You have to help another human being. Sometimes this lesson is not even overt. It's just there. We know that we have to be part of the worldwide human community.

Oh how the liars and haters and deniers of this world abhor us, Jews and Israelis alike. Every time our response is positive and helpful, our enemies undergo migraine headaches, high blood pressure, racing pulse, heart fibrillations and signs of stroke. They now have to think up new lies, new smears and new vendettas against Israel and Zionism. And, oh yes, against all Jews, even those that don't live in Israel.

Simon

By RACHEL PIUTI

Most people, if asked about Simon, would say that he was an honest, God-fearing man. If you would have asked Simon if it was true, he would have said yes. He sincerely believed himself to be an honest, God-fearing man.

"I wake up in the morning, pour water over my hands and face, put on my tallis and tefillin and prayer shawl, turn to the east and say my morning prayers. At dusk I say my evening prayers. I dress in my best garments and go to the synagogue on the Sabbath and on all other Jewish holidays. I stop smoking on Friday before sundown and wait patiently for the first three stars to show in the sky before I light up again. I fast on Yom Kippur and abstain from eating meat on Tisha B'Av, the commemoration of the destruction of the Temple."

Simon is a middle-aged man of medium height and medium build. He is humble, speaks softly and is deferential to those whom he considers his betters. He bows deeply and smiles politely when given a tip for opening a door or rendering some other service. Simon is a night watchman – this is his official job – but he does many other tasks besides watching the factory at night. I see him sometimes sweeping the yard in the morning before I go to school, and he often greets me with a cheerful smile when I come back home.

Bayla, Simon's wife, is a very devout woman. When I drop in on them on a Saturday afternoon, as I often do, I find her sitting at the window immersed in her prayer book. They have eight children – four sons and four daughters. The youngest, a boy of nine, is my age; the oldest, a daughter, is in her early twenties. They all live in one room and a kitchen, with no running water.

One of Simon's jobs is to feed the three watchdogs a diet of raw meat. It is supposed to keep them mean and vicious. He is the only person to enter their isolated kennel. He sometimes takes me up to the little balcony from where I can watch, with beating heart, as they run around in circles and snarl at each other.

About 10:00 at night, when everybody is back at home, Simon closes the gates and lets the dogs out from the kennel to run free in the factory yard. Anybody venturing out, except for Simon, would have been torn to pieces.

Ours is a leather factory and there is a lot of leather to protect from thieves. Most of the time the leather stays safe in the factory and there are no break-ins. But once in a while disaster strikes! One morning the gates stood open, the locks were broken, the dogs lay poisoned. Display rooms that were full of leather only the day before now stand empty. My father, his face ashen and voice shaky, talks to policemen and shows them around.

A few gloomy but busy days pass. There are consultations with serious looking men in grey suits. One morning Simon comes to our door, hat in hand, with only the skull cap on his balding head. He bows deferentially.

"I have something to tell you," he says to my father: "A man came to see me early this morning. He claims to know where the leather is and that the people would return it for a certain amount of money. They are willing to negotiate."

I see my father turn pale, his eyes dark with helpless rage. It is clear to him now; he is in the hands of a gang of thieves, and Simon is one of them. He is devastated and angry at the same time. He would like to fire Simon on the spot, but how can he? Simon has been with him for more than 20 years. He knows all the ins and outs of the factory. He could do more harm from the outside than when he earns his livelihood here. Besides, how could he send away a family with eight children? Simon is with him for life.

He will negotiate and salvage some of his losses.

"How much do they want?" Father asks Simon.

Leah's B/M

By MYRNA NEURINGER LEVY

Dear Family and Friends,

Now that we're home, the laundry done, the jet lag overcome, I've had time to reflect, and I can report on our family trip to Israel for Leah's bat mitzvah. It certainly was an amazing experience.

One of my souvenirs is a tiny bottle, holding perhaps a tablespoon of olive oil. The oil was pressed from olives grown on Neot Kiduim, a Biblical nature preserve mid-way between Jerusalem and Tel Aviv. Leah's bat mitzvah was there and we were given the bottle as a memento before we left.

I decided that the oil represents a miracle. As you know, we arrived in Israel shortly after Chanukah ended – Chanukah which celebrates the miracle of a small quantity of oil lasting for eight days. My miracle is that we survived travelling for two weeks with 15 family members.

What potential there was for disaster. If family stories of two generations travelling on a road trip are legend, imagine what it is like travelling with three generations in a bus. Add to it the emotional component of a bat mitzvah celebration and the stress increases. Our group consisted of seven elders like us, our children and their children. Sean, our son-in-law comes from a highly assimilated family. He never had a bar mitzvah, nor did his brother and uncle. Sean's brother married a non-Jewish woman and her mother, who wanted to see the Holy Land, joined us as well.

Eating kosher or non-kosher wasn't a problem for most of the travelers, but there were other dietary concerns. Among us were two vegetarians, a child who required gluten-free food and one with a nut allergy. Fortunately there is a vast variety of food choices in Israel, especially at breakfast.

Now I don't want to leave the impression that this was a trip filled with trial and tribulation. Not at all. There was much to enjoy and laugh about. On the first morning of our tour, a bright yellow bus pulled into the driveway of our hotel in Tel Aviv. Resting on the ledge inside the window was a sign, "Leah's B/M." After an initial double take we decided that B/M meant Bat Mitzvah and sure enough we saw many buses and vans with B/M signs as we criss-crossed Israel.

I'm not sure what Sean and his family expected to see in Israel, aside from ancient sites. It was a first trip for all of them, while Lisa, our daughter, Jake and I had been there many times. I know that they were impressed by Tel Aviv and the modernity of the hotels along the sea front. When the bus turned onto the toll road to drive north, Jake pointed out that it was built by the same company that built our Highway 407. Sean's brother's stopped looking at his BlackBerry. He continued to look out the window as we passed the buildings lining the highway, noting the high-tech companies they house. Davida, our Israeli guide, informed us that some kibbutzim are moving away from their agricultural based economy to high tech.

My first indication of how difficult it was going to be travelling with Sean's family came when Davida announced that we were going to stop for lunch at a place where we could get either falafel or shwarma. After explaining what shwarma is, she assured us that the meat would be kosher, I overheard Sean's mother say to her sister, "Kosher? We don't need to eat kosher. Why should we pay more to eat kosher?"

After stopping at enchanting Caesaria, and driving through beautiful Haifa, we arrived at Kibbutz Nof Ginossar on the Kinneret for the night. When we gathered for dinner we knew where our family group was going to sit in the dining room -there was another "Leah's B/M" sign on the table.

The Feldman Family B/M was seated at the table next to us. While chatting with them we discovered that they came from a suburb near Chicago. Our son-in-law was born in Chicago; his mother's family still lives there. They could play Jewish Geography.

The next day after a long day of touring north to Metulla, the Golan, the Dan Nature Preserve we returned to the Kibbutz. As we were getting off the bus Sean's mother said to her sister, "I have half a cheese sandwich I want to throw away, but I don't know where. The kibbutz is kosher." I assured her that any garbage receptacle would do.

Our journey continued. Awesome sights such as the caves of Rosh Hanikrah and the restored Citadel of Acco kept everyone enthralled. Finally we arrived in Jerusalem. I told Lisa that we were going to the Kotel before dinner. She agreed that Sean and the children would join us. The others, however, stayed behind, preferring to relax. After all, Sean's aunt remarked, only religious people go there Friday night. Besides, she continued, going to the Kotel was on our itinerary for Sunday.

The Kotel square was filled with masses of people, the ultra-Orthodox, Birthright groups, tourists like us, soldiers on leave for Shabbat. We saw the Feldman family from Chicago again and a Christian group that also stayed at the kibbutz when we were there. Although Sean rejected the fervor of the religious, he admitted that going was "an experience." Our grandson, who announces that he doesn't believe in any religion at every opportunity, said that while he couldn't see how a wall could have religious significance, it could be seen as important as an historical site.

Serendipitous meetings continued. While browsing in the Christian market, our daughter and family discovered that the owner of one souvenir shop comes to Toronto every August to set up a stall in the International Market of the EX. He invited us all to visit him next summer and he'll give us a special discount. The world is very small indeed.

Finally, the day arrived for Leah's bat mitzvah. Our yellow bus with the "Leah's B/M" sign drove us to Neot Keduim. The day was warm and sunny; we first walked along the paths, seeing how olives were pressed into oil during Biblical times and then learning how grapes were pressed into wine.

At last we arrived at the chapel for the Shacharit service. After changing out of her track pants and Ugg boots to a black skirt and top Leah was transformed. From a casually dressed, inquisitive thirteen year old, shlepping around, she became a mature, poised young teenager when she put on her kippah and tallit. Wearing a tallit was her choice and Jake and I had happily taken her to choose one, as we had taken her brother two and a half years before.

Except for the non-Jews, all of us had a role in the service, which was intimate and moving. Naturally, I "shepped nachos" watching Leah chant her Torah portion with such confidence. My pleasure deepened when Lisa and Sean were called to the Torah for an Aliyah, for it was Lisa who chanted the blessing. At the same time, there was a tinge of sadness as well because Leah is our youngest grandchild. As I did so many years ago at her mother's bat mitzvah, I had to recognize that there are no more babies in the family.

During lunch, Sean's aunt told Lisa how touched she was to be given a part in the service. Later that night when we were back in the hotel, Jake told me that Sean's uncle admitted that he sometimes regrets that he never had a bar mitzvah.

We left Jerusalem, our yellow bus driving us south towards Eilat. The "Leah's B/M" sign had mysteriously disappeared. Along the way, the younger generations rode camels, climbed the Snake Path up to Masada, swam in the Dead Sea and rapelled down the side of the Rimon Crater. The grandparent generation either watched and worried or took easier means of getting there, such as the cable car up to Masada.

There was time for rest, relaxation and shopping in Eilat, as well as a trip to Petra, in Jordan. Once again, we were overwhelmed by the engineering capabilities of the ancient people.

It was time to return to Tel Aviv, have a last look at the city and drive to the airport. Most of the group was staying an extra night or two. As we kissed goodbye, Sean's mother kept exclaiming how amazing it was that we were all still talking to each other. I nodded in agreement, my tongue sore from biting it so hard. "And," she added, "I never expected Israel would be so varied and so beautiful."

Then I understood. We were all wrong that first day; B/M actually stands for "Bonding Mission."

Hope you are all well; keep in touch.

Affirmation

By JUDIE ORON

A few years ago I decided to start a new Movement. Whenever the opportunity arose, I planned to look people in the eye and say with enormous enthusiasm, "My Heavens! YOU ARE ABSOLUTELY RIGHT!"

You have to understand – I was living in Israel at the time. People there rarely say that you're right about anything. Why would they? They're sabras – they're supposed to be prickly.

I started with my ninth grade class. These kids are way down at the bottom of the pecking order. They're never told that they're right about anything. They've got to get older, bigger, louder and much more intimidating, and even then, how often does it happen?

Stefan was trying to explain why he hadn't done his homework. I'd been sitting in class, waiting for almost any reasonable opportunity to do the affirmation thing. It was time these kids got some positive reinforcement, especially Stefan, who was still new in the country. Linguistically, his absorption was going pretty well, but his clothes were from another, not-exactly-vintage era and his hair was still being cut using the old bowl-on-the-head method. Not surprisingly, he was rarely blessed with an upbeat look or a high five from any of the other kids.

Stefan was one of my pet projects, right up there with abolishing the television tax. I'd vowed to myself that by the end of the year I'd find a way to get this kid to bloom.

The day it all started he was explaining that he'd been doing his homework at the sea shore when a remote-controlled shark – the Municipality's latest recruit in their effort to clean up the beaches – careened onto his blanket and ate his essay, thinking, probably, that it was trash.

"It was only a few minutes before class started, teach," he shrugged earnestly. "Who had time to rewrite the essay?"

"Well, of course you didn't! You are absolutely right, Stefan!" I thundered, clapping him on the back.

The class greeted this remark with such complete silence that my headmistress came in to see if there was anything wrong. "No, everything's just fine," I mumbled, hoping that would suffice. Well, wouldn't you know it? That was the day she decided to observe the class.

Observation or not, I wasn't going to give up so easily. I could see that the other kids had gotten over their shock and were giving Stefan an enthusiastic thumbs up. That total drip had managed to put one over on the teacher. Wow! Things like that didn't happen very often.

My headmistress looked confused but I was elated. My project was well on its way.

"Nobody's speaking. What lesson is this – meditation?" the headmistress asked sarcastically.

"Creative writing," I answered. "Stefan was about to finish telling us his wonderful story about a mechanical shark."

Stefan looked a bit taken aback but quickly recovered and began to elaborate on his story – minus the homework issue, of course. My headmistress was a viper when it came to unfulfilled homework assignments.

In short order, the beaches of Tel Aviv had thereafter become as spotless as – well, I don't know any spotless beaches to compare it to – and it was all due to the army of mechanical sea creatures who, apart from frightening little babies out of their diapers, had chewed up every scrap of paper and empty soda can in sight.

Well, who could have predicted that Stefan had a talent for sci-fi? The headmistress was impressed. I was impressed. But more importantly, the other kids were in awe. In the course of one lesson, Stefan became to them the most interesting person in class. A story by Stefan thereafter became a staple. Woe to the teacher whose lesson plan didn't allow for one of his outrageous tales.

By the end of the year, Stefan had bloomed and I could go back to fighting the television tax people. Of course, it didn't hurt that he'd grown five inches, acquired a tattered but elegant denim jacket and co-ordinated the look by dying his hair to match.

Reinforced by my success, I decided to try the new Movement out on my divorce group. At first, I was afraid that my coven of disgruntled females would be a tougher crowd to reinforce, but much to my surprise it went over brilliantly. Spurned by their spouses, left financially bereft and struggling with offspring in various stages of trauma, my affirmations were just what was needed to soothe these women's shattered souls.

In fact, judging by the results of a recent census, it seemed that the entire population was starved for a bit of affirmation. And that brings me to the results of the last election.

Now, you'd asked – how did someone like me get voted into the Knesset? It turns out that you can go a long way simply by telling people that they're right. It's even more infectious than H1N1! And it certainly doesn't hurt that divorced women comprise the largest and fastest-growing electoral segment in the country (YOU ARE ABSOLUTELY RIGHT! There is something wrong with that last statistic. But as long as it's working in my favour I plan to keep using it).

This is the place to say that I very much appreciate your vote for my party AFN, standing for Affirmation of course. But I do resent the comments of those who wrote in to complain that the country has become much more boring now that people are routinely agreeing with each other.

I urge you to be patient – I'm working on it.

Best wishes for a Happy and Healthy Passover

Promise Land

By MIRIAM PRESZOW WEINER

At the age of twenty
He made his first trip to the Promise Land
Such a glorious moment in time
The wonders he discovered were biblical and sublime

He climbed up to Masada
Gazed upon the sea below
He watched the sunrise in the sky
And felt its loving glow
He floated in the Dead Sea
Took a mud bath at the spa
Sunbathed at the lowest spot on earth
His mind was filled with awe
He marched into the army camps
And trained for three days long
He learned how they protect the land
And keep the country strong

He laughed he danced he sang
He prayed at the Wailing Wall
There was so much to discover
He wanted to see it all
He learned about his heritage
And what was yet to be
And with his own gentle hands
He planted a brand new tree

In loving memory of his Zaida Fischel
The land of Israel his Zaida often spoke about
The Promise Land
His Zaida did not see
Now Zaida Fischel smiles on us
From heavens golden sky
A gentle dove wings through the land
His loving soul flies way up high

Still missing at the seder

A mock seder table reminding the world that Gilad Schalit is still a captive of Hamas in Gaza was set up outside Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's house in Jerusalem before the beginning of the Passover holiday. Schalit was kidnapped by Hamas in June 2006.

Ezrin leaving CIJA

Compiled by CJN Staff

Hershell Ezrin is resigning his position as chief executive officer of the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA).

Ezrin, 64, CIJA's founding CEO, announced last week that he will vacate his position on June 30.

Hershell Ezrin

"I am enormously proud of what the CIJA team has achieved in putting Canadian Jewish advocacy on a new footing, based on measured results. But after seven years, I think this is a logical moment in the evolution of the organization to pass on the reins of leadership."

Steven Cummings, chair of the CIJA board, called Ezrin's announcement "understandable but disappointing to all of us who have had the pleasure of working with him over the past seven years. He has brought a unique mix of political understanding, strategic awareness and media savvy to the advancement of our issues. Hershell Ezrin has been an exemplary ambassador for the Jewish community with the broader Canadian public."

Brent Belzberg, past CIJA co-chair, said, "I want to thank Hershell Ezrin for bringing our community's advocacy to the level of sophistication that it currently enjoys. Our effectiveness stands today as a model commanding respect and emulation by Jewish community organizations in other countries."

CIJA was established seven years ago following a review by a group of senior business and community leaders, called the Israel Emergency Cabinet, who wanted to make the Jewish community's advocacy more effective.

The News in Brief

Canada

Mayor To Run Again

EDMONTON — Edmonton Mayor Stephen Mandel said last week that he's running for a third three-year term as mayor. Mandel, a former city councillor, has been mayor since 2004, when he beat an incumbent looking for a fourth term, and is the first Jew to hold the post in Edmonton. Mandel, 64, won re-election in 2007 with 66 per cent of the vote. The election will be held Oct. 18.

Team Forfeits Game

MONTREAL — A midget league hockey team in the Montreal suburb of Dollard-des-Ormeaux had to forfeit a key game because it conflicted with the first night of Passover. At least 10 of the 15 players on the Dollard-des-Ormeaux Midget B Civics are Jewish and were unwilling to miss the first seder, the Montreal Gazette reported. Team manager Eva-Lynn Gross appealed to the municipality and the Lac St. Louis hockey league. "They should work around stuff like this," she told the Gazette. But league executive director Sylvain McSween said that there "are 700 hockey matches in less than three weeks, and we can't have any changes... One special case leads to another and another. There's nothing we can do." The league wouldn't let the team switch places with another squad that offered its spot so the Civics' game wouldn't conflict with the first seder.

Ex-Ring Champ Dies

MONTREAL — Jerry Shears, a Jewish former Canadian lightweight boxing champion who spent years crusading for protective headgear in the amateur ring, died March 21 at Montreal's St. Anne's Veterans Hospital at age 84 . The son of pro boxer Joe Schulman, Shears also became a well-known insurance broker. He never fought professionally, but was founder and for years served as president of the Canadian Amateur Boxing Association.

World

Divestment Vetoed

SAN FRANCISCO — The student government president at the University of California, Berkeley, vetoed a bill urging divestment from two firms doing business with Israel. Will Smelko vetoed the measure March 24. The bill, which passed by a 16-4 vote, singled out United Technologies and General Electric for supplying Israel with technology used to perpetrate "war crimes" and was widely condemned by Jewish campus groups. Smelko said that while students don't want "to fund weapons, war crimes or human rights violations, this veto has to do with... building peace and goodwill in a way that avoids the shortcomings of the bill [such as a]... selective, one-sided focus on a specific country that lacks important historical context." He added that it was seen "as a symbolic attack on a specific community of our fellow students."

Community Rallied To Help Deli Owners

CALGARY — More than 20 volunteers from Calgary's Jewish community helped keep the city's only kosher deli alive when its co-owners took ill at the same time late last year.

Denise and Ivan Kavin

Denise Kavin, 58, ran the Haifa Deli alone for 14 days in late December when her husband, Ivan, 60, had open-heart surgery. Denise then ended up in hospital after she came down with bronchial asthma and infected lungs. Ivan came out of hospital and tried to run the deli alone, but the couple ended up in hospital once again.

At that point, members of Congregation House of Jacob-Mikveh Israel volunteered to help the Kavins, who have been running the deli since 2005.

The couple were both back at work in early February.

"[The volunteers] are a group of angels," Denise told the Calgary Herald. "How do you thank them all?"

Shoah List For Sale

NEW YORK — The only privately held original copy of Oskar Schindler's Shoah-era list of Jews he saved is on sale for $2.2 million. A historical document sales specialist in upstate New York is selling the list on behalf of an anonymous seller on a "first come, first serve" basis on the website MomentsInTime.com. The 13-page list, dated April 18, 1945, contains 801 names. It was made famous in the Oscar-winning film Schindler's List. There are four other surviving copies: one each in the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum and the German federal archives, and two at Yad Vashem.

New kashrut agency gains Toronto foothold

By JENNIFER M. MACLEOD
Special to the CJN

Many large and vibrant Jewish communities have more than one kashrut agency: the hamlet of Monsey, N.Y., has six, and Los Angeles has three or four, as does Montreal. New York City has more than 20, but even Detroit has four.

For 30 years, Toronto had only one, the venerable Kashruth Council of Canada, which is often identified with its COR hechsher, which is short for Council of Orthodox Rabbis.

Two years ago, Rabbi Moshe Bensalmon and Rabbi Amram Assayag decided to change that. After 20 years as a COR mashgiach (kosher supervisor), Rabbi Bensalmon wanted to continue working hands-on in kashrut while offering both consumers and food producers a reputable alternative. With Rabbi Assayag as its rabbinic supervisor, Badatz Toronto was launched in April 2008.

Badatz Toronto currently has two restaurants under its supervision, as well as three caterers, one banquet facility and nine food companies.

Rabbi Amram Assayag

The organization's name, Badatz, is an acronym for Beit Din Tzedek, a name already used by several kashrut agencies around the world, the best-known being Jerusalem's Edah HaChareidis, perhaps the world's most widely respected supervisory agency.

"There's been a need for a second organization [in Toronto] for many years," said Moti Bensalmon, Rabbi Bensalmon's son and administrator of the fledgling kashrut organization.

When the Kashruth Council began operating, there were 20,000 Jews in the Toronto area. By 2008, that number had grown to almost 200,000. "It's long overdue," Moti Bensalmon said.

Both Rabbi Bensalmon and Rabbi Assayag are well known in the community at large and in the field of kashrut.

Rabbi Bensalmon was a familiar face for years to kosher shoppers at the Clark-Hilda Sobeys in Thornhill. Rabbi Assayag, in addition to his many years on the COR's Vaad Hakashrut, remains spiritual leader of Kehilat Abir Yaakob (at the Sephardic Kehila Centre), as well as head of the Sephardic Rabbinate of Ontario.

Despite its Sephardi connections, the new kashrut agency aims to serve the entire Jewish community.

Moti Bensalmon says one of the organization's goals was "to offer business owners an alternative" to the high price of maintaining a kosher establishment.

As a smaller organization with less administrative overhead, Badatz Toronto can "pass along those savings to people who want to sell or manufacture kosher products," he said.

But lower prices doesn't mean lower standards. Bensalmon believes that having more than one kashrut organization will actually "raise the bar" of kosher standards. "Wherever there's competition, standards of kashrut always increase."

The new organization requires that each company under its supervision employ a mashgiach temidi, a kosher supervisor who is always on the premises. This "working mashgiach," in addition to safeguarding the premises' kosher status, can also help the establishment in other ways, in the kitchen or elsewhere.

U.S. harms peace hopes

March was a terrible month for Israeli-U.S. relations. Casual Mideast observers, serious students of the ongoing conflict and even staunch opponents of Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu have been taken aback by the vehemence and the duration of the Obama administration's recent criticism of Israel.

From the editor's desk...

As of this writing, nearly three weeks after the baleful Biden embarrassment in Jerusalem on March 9, the level of friction between the two countries' governments remains very high.

We had hoped and perhaps even assumed that Netanyahu's visit to Washington, D.C., and the hastily arranged visit with the president would calm the roiling diplomatic waters. Our hopes were dashed. Our assumptions proved false.

Netanyahu encamped with President Barack Obama for a long period of time, late into the evening last week. But they arrived at no mutual agreement, let alone happy conclusion. The words used to describe their meeting were decidedly clinical and cool. Spokespeople for the two leaders assiduously avoided any adjectives that could depict even a slight measure of warmth between the two men. Neither party offered to sing, "For he's a jolly good fellow."

The American reaction to the "Biden moment" was way over the top.

The U.S. vice-president suggested Israeli behaviour was endangering American troops. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton hectored Netanyahu for almost one hour on the phone and concluded her public rebuke with a set of four sweeping demands of Israel that included: cancellation of the building plan for Ramat Shlomo in east Jerusalem, release of Palestinian prisoners, more easing of travel restrictions in the West Bank, and a declaration of Israeli willingness to discuss final-status issues in the proximity talks.

Netanyahu and his staff, as well as some cabinet ministers, struggled in vain last week in Washington to placate the president regarding these demands.

Israeli political columnist Aluf Benn described the prime minister's departure from Washington in bleak terms. "The prime minister leaves America disgraced, isolated and altogether weaker than when he came."

Benn painted a dark, gloomy image of the situation. It is hard to argue with him.

There are at least two reasons why it is appropriate to describe the administration's reaction to the "Biden moment" as being and continuing to be way over the top.

1. Netanyahu immediately, effusively and quite generously apologized to his guest. In comparable situations, the apology is accepted and the matter set aside. That did not happen here.

2. The substance of the housing announcement was old news. The report that so exorcised Biden was about a municipal, clerical, administrative procedure that is typical of every city hall in the democratic world. City hall committees deliberate and then publish the minutes of their deliberations. The Ramat Shlomo minutes were published, a reporter wrote about it in the paper, Biden saw it and reacted, consulted with the president, and then re-reacted with greater fury and umbrage. More tellingly, the Obama administration had already agreed and publicly allowed that Israel would not be required to stop housing projects in east Jerusalem.

U.S. President Barack Obama

In this singular "inconvenient truth" lies the most troubling aspect of the administration's clearly calculated aggressive reaction to Israel.

What faith can Israel now place in U.S. understandings, commitments and promises to the Jewish state? When one adds this broken promise to the earlier declaration by the Obama administration that it is not bound by contents of the letter from president George W. Bush to Ariel Sharon regarding the relationship of the June '67 borders to a final peace agreement, it will be very difficult for this and subsequent Israeli governments to trust American ones.

For reasons about which we can only speculate, Obama seized on the housing announcement snafu, ignored Netanyahu's apology, directed his secretary of state to berate Netanyahu and push Israel into a very public corner.

Obama has significantly retarded the peace process between the two sides. His early insistence on a settlement freeze provided Palestinian Authority Mahmoud Abbas with a pretext for stopping direct negotiations. Israeli construction in the West Bank had never before prevented the PA leader from directly negotiating with Israel's leaders, including Sharon. It also provided Abbas with a promontory onto which he climbed and from which now he gleefully watches Israel's public degradation.

Since Obama became president, Abbas has not walked near, let alone sat down at, a table to negotiate directly with Israel. He had only recently agreed, grudgingly, to engage in indirect negotiations – proximity talks – with Israel. But he quickly retreated from that agreement once he saw the extent of America's pillorying of Netanyahu.

Abbas is laughing.

And of course, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad of Iran, Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas and Hassan Nasrallah of Hezbollah are laughing too. MBD

SEDER STUDENTS

Some 200 immigrants from Ethiopia attended a model seder on March 25 at the Jewish Agency For Israel's absorption centre in Mevasseret Zion, outside Jerusalem, in preparation for their first Passover in Israel. So far in 2010, the Jewish Agency has brought 1,000 Ethiopians to Israel.

Center for Peace seeks Canadian presence

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Arie Raif is a former diplomat who can shmooze with the best of them. He knows how to promote a story all on his own, but last week, he had help from a pair of disparate sources.

Early in the week, Canada's minister of state for sport, Gary Lunn, announced support for international sports initiatives that included a grant to the Peres Center for Peace. Raif is head of the Canadian arm of the Peres Center.

Then later in the week, Shimon Peres himself, the president of Israel, told delegates from 53 member states attending the XXXIV Ordinary UEFA Congress in Tel Aviv, that "football [soccer] is a major contribution to peace" and the "game is a way to overcome gaps and prejudices. Football is the bridge between Israeli and Palestinian children and between the peoples in these difficult times."

All music to Raif's ears, no doubt.

The former consular official is busy trying to put together the Canadian wing of the Israel-based peace group, starting with a Canadian board consisting of prominent philanthropists, academics and politicians.

The board of the U.S. wing of the organization boasts high-profile figures such as former secretaries of state Henry Kissinger, James Baker and Warren Christopher, along with former president Jimmy Carter. The organization's international board of governors includes two well-known Canadians, Paul Desmarais Jr., chair of Power Corporation, and Charles Sirois, CEO of Telesystem, a private equity corporation.

The Peres Center, Raif said, "is building peace by taking a charitable, humanitarian approach to issues."

At the heart of the centre's efforts are 27 joint Israeli and Palestinian soccer teams that bring together youth from both communities to play exhibition tournaments. The games span the gamut from the elite level – Spanish league champions Real Madrid played an exhibition in Ramat Gan three years ago versus a team of Israeli and Arab stars – to high school kids from disadvantaged communities getting together for games and practice. The Canadian government grant, which totalled nearly $100,000, went to the Peres Center's twinned peace soccer school for girls, said Vanessa Schneider, director of communications for the minister.

Although sports are an important vehicle for the Peres Center to promote its mission, it doesn't limit itself to athletic endeavours.

As its website indicates, "The Peres Center focuses on common Arab and Israeli social, economic, developmental, cultural and educational interests, with an emphasis on nurturing Palestinian-Israeli relations. The Peres Center designs and facilitates tangible peace building projects that address these interests, utilizing cross-border, regional and international partnerships to bring these initiatives to fruition."

One area outside the soccer pitch that the centre pushes is "developing water treatment and crop management technology," Raif said. "We give the technology to Palestinian farmers to treat water and develop crop management."

It has also sponsored a "space camp" for Israeli and Palestinian youth in which a group of young people travelled to Turkey to study the history of space exploration and experience some time in a simulator that mimicked a space mission.

Jewish and Muslim children play soccer together in opportunities provided by the Peres Center for Peace.

"It's people to people, it's building co-operation and it's nurturing a culture of peace with the region's youth," he said. "We have to eradicate the stigma each party has in the eyes of the other."

Raif believes the ethos of the Peres Center speaks directly to Canadians. "If there is a model of coexistence and reconciliation, Canada is it."

For the Peres Center, sports provides a number of benefits in improving relations between Israelis and Palestinians. It creates dialogue, it is inclusive and fosters coexistence, teamwork and respect. It builds skills in conflict management and it brings a sense of normalcy to people in a conflict situation.

In announcing $504,159 in new funding – in addition to $1.6 million already spent – for a number of international sport and development initiatives, the federal government said that it "recognized that sport helps build sustainable communities, supports social inclusion, engages youth at risk and contributes to a global culture of peace."

'There is certainly room for two in the market'

Raising the bar is essential, Bensalmon said, pointing to a 2006 incident in Monsey when a kosher butcher was caught selling non-kosher chicken to trusting consumers. Since then, Bensalmon said, many major kashrut organizations have started to adopt the mashgiach temidi standard, regardless of whether a business' owner is observant.

Bensalmon believes a kashrut agency should be kosher through and through: consistent and transparent not only in its scrutiny of ingredients, but also in terms of its business practices and dealings with companies and individuals.

Badatz Toronto offers a comprehensive training program to give a company's employees, not just the mashgiach, the knowledge required to produce kosher food. And soon Badatz Toronto's website (http://www.badatz.ca/) will also offer clear policies for business owners and their employees.

Given Rabbi Bensalmon's experience as a longtime mashgiach, his son said Badatz Toronto is also focusing on enshrining improved rights for mashgichim. Historically, he said, they've often been treated with disrespect by the food industry.

After two years of carving out a kashrut alternative in Toronto, Bensalmon said he's pleased with what he's seen so far.

"There's a certain element of apprehension ... when something new comes along. People question it. They're suspicious."

But in the end, he said, "there certainly is room for two in the market," and what may look like competition is a good thing for companies, consumers and overall kosher standards.

So good, in fact, that he said he'd even see it as a positive development if another organization here – Lubavitch, for example – decided to enter the kashrut business. "We would welcome it."

Cuban Jews inaugurate a sefer Torah

Compiled by CJN Staff

The smell of delicious kosher food is not a very common one in Havana. But bringing the Cuban Jewish community together there is a common practice of the Canadian Friends of Cuban Jewry (CFCJ).

In February, a new sefer Torah was donated to the Cuban Jewish community via a CFCJ member. The event began with CFCJ representative Rabbi Naftali Spielman telling the community about the importance of each letter of the Torah. He explained that if one single letter is missing, it renders the Torah unkosher. So, too, the Jewish people are compared to the letters of the Torah, he said. Each Jew counts to complete the Jewish nation.

With that in mind, the CFCJ aims to look after Cuban Jews by bringing them food, clothing and medication, and holding communal activities and gatherings.

The traditional recitations, at the conclusion of a sefer Torah, were proudly chanted by all, as Rabbi Daniel Illulian of Beverly Hills, Calif., led the prayers with much enthusiasm.

At one point the joy and ecstasy of community members dancing with the Torah was so great that they poured out into the street. At the conclusion of the event, the CFCJ gave each Cuban Jew a bag of kosher food. Also, while they were in Cuba, CFCJ emissaries visited many homes providing humanitarian aid and words of inspiration.

Correction

In the obituary on Izzy Kaplan, "Bookstore owner helped people in Israel and at home" (March 25), the date of Kaplan's death was incorrect. The owner of Israel's Judaica died on March 14. The CJN regrets the error.

OPEN LETTER FROM YORK UNIVERSITY

York University has been accused of harbouring and tolerating racist and specifically anti-Semitic behaviour. On the contrary, we condemn those who use the cover of free expression or academic freedom to promote anti-Semitism or any racist agendas.

We reject as an assault on our integrity and on the integrity of the members of the York community, the allegations that we deal with different groups within the student body differentially.

The University is a forum for the free exchange of ideas. The free exchange of ideas does not include intimidation and racial discrimination. Nor will we bow to those who demand that we narrow the boundaries of academic freedom. We oppose those who abuse the rights of others.

The York community must be one where its members do not arrive on campus to study or to work in fear of physical assault. The University has taken steps to deal with those who abuse the University's commitment to the free exchange of ideas and breach the standards of student behaviour. These steps include increased security, greater power to intercede, and consistent enforcement of policies.

We are not so foolish to believe that we have driven anti-Semitism or any other form of racism from our midst. We know that there will be incidents that will require our vigilance. But we have demonstrated that we have the will to act.

For many who come to our university, York is the first exposure to the world beyond their ethnic communities. York accepts the responsibility of teaching its students how to be citizens in a contemporary, diverse, Canadian society. Our goal is to equip our students with the tools they need in a less than perfect world. And we do so in a way that prepares them to participate responsibly in a global exchange of ideas.

Riding Obama's tilted bandwagon

In its deliberations last weekend in Libya, the Arab League once again put forward its best peace-making effort by repeatedly censuring and threatening Israel. The league's secretary general, Amr Moussa, set the tone by sounding a dire alarm and implying that something other than negotiations might soon be in order.

"We must prepare for the possibility that the peace process will be a complete failure," Moussa said. "This is the time to stand up to Israel. (Our emphasis) We must find alternative options, because the situation appears to have reached a turning point."

Palestinian Authority (PA) President Mahmoud Abbas sang high harmony to Moussa's low tune.

As reported by the Jerusalem Post, Abbas promised there would be no peace agreement with Israel unless the Jewish state "ends the occupation of Palestinian land, first and foremost east Jerusalem." The situation in Jerusalem was dangerous, Abbas said, and could ignite the entire Middle East. His final point of emphasis was that the PA would not resume peace talks with Israel, including indirect talks, until Israel stops construction in the settlements.

Not wishing to miss a free ride when it was offered them, the Arab leaders heartily jumped upon the American administration's bandwagon, now heavily loaded and tilted from last month's hyper-criticism of Israel.

Thus, Amr Moussa urged his fellow league members to "stand up to Israel" in the manner displayed by U.S. President Barack Obama last month with his very public show of pique and anger at Israel's Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

Thus, Abbas repeated his more than year-long refusal to negotiate either directly or indirectly with Israel "until Israel stops construction in the settlements," a pre-condition he, adapted from Obama's very own peace-making formula.

Joining the anti-Israel chorus was the specially invited guest, Recep Tayyip Erdogan, the prime minister of Turkey.

"Jerusalem is the apple of the eye of each and every Muslim ... and we cannot at all accept any Israeli violation in Jerusalem or in Muslim sites," Erdogan said. (Our emphasis) Thus the Turkish prime minister's merely echoed the U.S. president's condemnation of Israel's decision to continue to build houses in east Jerusalem.

It is hard to know how far the anti-Israel fallout will spin from Obama's severe hectoring of Netanyahu. The implicit threats from the Arab League are simply the most recent result. They are of a piece with the fact that since the signing of the now discredited Oslo accords, the Obama administration is the first American administration under which there have been no peace talks of any kind between Israel and the PA.

Abbas refuses to talk Netanyahu. Netanyahu at every opportunity urges Abbas to resume talks. And Obama pressures Netanyahu.

Greetings from the Prime Minister

It is with great pleasure that I extend my warmest greetings to Jewish Canadians as you observe Passover.

Commemorating the Exodus from Egypt and liberation of the Children of Israel, Pesach is a celebration of emancipation. Throughout the centuries, the Jewish people have drawn strength and inspiration from this momentous event.

Canada is blessed with a strong and devout Jewish community. As you celebrate the sacred traditions of Passover, you may be heartened by the wonderful spiritual legacy you have bestowed on generations of Jewish Canadians. Your adherence to faith and traditions as a community strengthens our society.

On behalf of the government of Canada and my wife, Laureen, please accept my heartfelt wishes for a happy and peaceful Pesach. Chag Samayach!

Israeli-Palestinian Peace Week?

I was happy to read that Jewish university students felt that Israeli Apartheid Week (IAW) "was much milder this year, with fewer anti-Semitic incidents and smaller crowds," despite an IAW spokesperson stating that IAW events were well attended ("IAW fizzles on Canadian campuses," March 18). Instead of having separate anti- and pro-Israel events, I think we are missing an opportunity for Jewish and Muslim students to dialogue on campus and off.

On March 16, just two days after the end of IAW, I had the privilege of sitting in a room with more than 200 Muslim students at McMaster University and listening to Tariq Ramadan, a well-known Muslim scholar, lecture on the rights and responsibilities of living as Muslims in Canada. The event was open to the public and sponsored by Hamilton's Cordoba House, whose mandate is to be an intellectual Muslim voice through dialogue, understanding and research. Ramadan's message reminded me so much of how I was taught "Torah im derech eretz," live your religious life, but also obey the laws of the land. I said so during the question period. I said it was time that Muslim and Jewish students learned about and from each other. My comments were answered with loud applause and requests for contact information from the Cordoba House organizers and several of the students.

Perhaps next year we will celebrate Jewish-Muslim Dialogue Week or Israeli-Palestinian Peace Week on Canadian campuses.

Israel boycott campaign will fail

While repudiating the underlying premises of the boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) campaign's vile efforts to isolate and delegitimize Israel, Sheldon Kirshner then refers to recent and ongoing BDS activities and the threat they pose ("Israel targeted by boycott campaign," Kirshner file, March 18). What Kirshner fails to note is that the common thread that links all local BDS activities – including this year's annual Israeli Apartheid Week campus hate-fest – is their abject failure.

The Arab states failed in their decades-long effort to isolate and weaken Israel through economic sanctions. So, too, the ongoing BDS campaign to delegitimize Israel, by the strange coalition established by Palestinians but now dominated, in Kirshner's words, by "European and North American left-wingers with anarchist and Marxist backgrounds," will ultimately fail because of its own evil intent.

Wrong to teach one point of view

After reading the article "School libraries cautioned about book" (March 11), I agree with York Region's school board who suggested that "facilitated discussions" be provided to balance the perspective of the controversial book, The Shepherd's Granddaughter. If the quotes from the book in the article are accurate, there is no doubt the book is one-sided and paints a prejudiced picture of Jews and the State of Israel. For example, a Palestinian said of Israelis, "Innocent? No Israeli is innocent Why should we let them live in peace? They don't deserve it."

I am a 15-year-old Orthodox student at a private day school, and I have grown up experiencing anti-Semitism. I believe that the purpose of schools is to educate students so they are knowledgeable and learn to respect all people, provided they are fair and just. I have also grown to believe that there is no place, especially in public schools, to teach just one point of view. The Shepherd's Granddaughter is biased and educates children to be prejudiced when it comes to the Israeli-Arab conflict. A more balanced point of view is found in the book The Case for Peace by Alan Dershowitz.

Israel ready to compromise for peace

The following are excerpts from the address by Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu to the American Israel Public Affairs Committee conference in Washington on March 23.

As the world faces monumental challenges, I know that Israel and America will face them together. We stand together because we are fired by the same ideals and inspired by the same dream – the dream of achieving security, prosperity and peace…

Time and again, the Israeli army was forced to repel attacks of much larger enemies determined to destroy us. When Egypt and Jordan recognized that we could not be defeated in battle, they embraced the path of peace.

Yet, there are those who continue the assault against the Jewish state and who openly call for our destruction. They seek to achieve this goal through terrorism, missile attacks and, most recently, by developing atomic weapons…

The future of the Jewish state can never depend on the goodwill of even the greatest of men. Israel must always reserve the right to defend itself.

Today, an unprecedented threat to humanity looms large. A radical Iranian regime armed with nuclear weapons could bring an end to the era of nuclear peace the world has enjoyed for the last 65 years. Such a regime could provide nuclear weapons to terrorists and might even be tempted to use them. Our world would never be the same.

Iran's brazen bid to develop nuclear weapons is first and foremost a threat to Israel, but it is also a grave threat to the region and to the world. Israel expects the international community to act swiftly and decisively to thwart this danger.

But we will always reserve the right to self-defence. We must also defend ourselves against lies and vilifications.

Throughout history, the slanders against the Jewish people always preceded the physical assaults against us and were used to justify these assaults. The Jews were called the well-poisoners of mankind, the fomenters of instability, the source of all evil under the sun. Unfortunately, these libellous attacks against the Jewish people also did not end with the creation of Israel.

For a time, overt anti-Semitism was held in check by the shame and shock of the Holocaust. But only for a time. In recent decades the hatred of the Jews has re-emerged with increasing force, but with an insidious twist. It is not merely directed at the Jewish People, but increasingly, at the Jewish state. In its most pernicious form, it argues that if only Israel did not exist, many of the world's problems would go away.

Does this mean that Israel is above criticism? Of course not…

But Israel should be judged by the same standards applied to all nations, and allegations against Israel must be grounded in fact.

One allegation that is not is the attempt to describe the Jews as foreign colonialists in their own homeland, one of the great lies of modern times.

In my office, I have a signet ring that was loaned to me by Israel's Department of Antiquities. The ring was found next to the Western Wall, but it dates back some 2,800 years, 200 years after King David turned Jerusalem into our capital city.

The ring is a seal of a Jewish official, and inscribed on it in Hebrew is his name Netanyahu Ben-Yoash…

The connection between the Jewish People and the Land of Israel cannot be denied. The connection between the Jewish People and Jerusalem cannot be denied. The Jewish People were building Jerusalem 3,000 year ago and the Jewish People are building Jerusalem today.

Jerusalem is not a settlement. It is our capital.

In Jerusalem, my government has maintained the policies of all Israeli governments since 1967, including those led by Golda Meir, Menachem Begin and Yitzhak Rabin.

Today, nearly a quarter of a million Jews, almost half the city's Jewish population, live in neighbourhoods that are just beyond the 1949 armistice lines. All these neighbourhoods are within a five-minute drive from the Knesset. They are an integral and inextricable part of modern Jerusalem.

Everyone knows that these neighbourhoods will be part of Israel in any peace settlement. Therefore, building in them in no way precludes the possibility of a two-state solution…

It's only under Israeli sovereignty in Jerusalem that religious freedom for all faiths has been guaranteed. While we cherish our homeland, we also recognize that Palestinians live there as well.

We don't want to govern them. We don't want to rule them. We want them as neighbours, living in security, dignity and peace.

Yet Israel is unjustly accused of not wanting peace with the Palestinians. Nothing could be further from the truth. My government has consistently shown its commitment to peace in both word and deed.

From Day 1, we called on the Palestinian Authority to begin peace negotiations without delay. I make that same call today: President (Mahmoud) Abbas, come and negotiate peace.

Leaders who truly want peace should sit down face-to-face.

Of course, the United States can help the parties solve their problems, but it cannot solve the problems for the parties.

Peace cannot be imposed from the outside. It can only come through direct negotiations in which we develop mutual trust. Last year, I spoke of a vision of peace in which a demilitarized Palestinian state recognizes the Jewish state.

Just as the Palestinians expect Israel to recognize a Palestinian state, we expect the Palestinians to recognize the Jewish state.

My government has removed hundreds of roadblocks, barriers and checkpoints, facilitating Palestinian movement. As a result, we have helped spur a fantastic boom in the Palestinian economy…

And we announced an unprecedented moratorium on new Israeli construction in Judea and Samaria.

This is what my government has done for peace. What has the Palestinian Authority done for peace?

Well, they have placed preconditions on peace talks, waged a relentless international campaign to undermine Israel's legitimacy, and promoted the notorious Goldstone report that falsely accuses Israel of war crimes…

I want to thank President [Barack] Obama and the United States Congress for their efforts to thwart this libel, and I ask for your continued support.

Regrettably, the Palestinian Authority has also continued incitement against Israel. A few days ago, a public square near Ramallah was named after a terrorist who murdered 37 Israeli civilians, including 13 children. The Palestinian Authority did nothing to prevent it.

Peace requires reciprocity. It cannot be a one-way street in which only Israel makes concessions.

Israel stands ready to make the compromises necessary for peace. But we expect the Palestinians to compromise as well.

But one thing I will never compromise on is our security…

A peace agreement with the Palestinians must include effective security arrangements on the ground. Israel must make sure that what happened in Lebanon and Gaza doesn't happen again in the West Bank.

Israel's main security problem with Lebanon is not its border with Lebanon. It is Lebanon's border with Syria, through which Iran and Syria smuggle tens of thousands of weapons to Hezbollah.

Israel's main security problem with Gaza is not its border with Gaza. It's Gaza's border with Egypt, under which nearly 1,000 tunnels have been dug to smuggle weapons.

Experience has shown that only an Israeli presence on the ground can prevent weapons smuggling.

This is why a peace agreement with the Palestinians must include an Israeli presence on the eastern border of a future Palestinian state.

If peace with the Palestinians proves its durability over time, we can review security arrangements.

We are prepared to take risks for peace, but we will not be reckless with the lives of our people and the life of the one and only Jewish state.

The people of Israel want a future in which our children no longer experience the horrors of war.

We want a future in which Israel realizes its full potential as a global centre of technology, anchored in its values and living in peace with all its neighbours…

I am confident that in pursuing these goals, we have the enduring friendship of the United States of America, the greatest nation on earth. The American people have always shown their courage, their generosity and their decency.

From one president to the next, from one Congress to the next, America's commitment to Israel's security has been unwavering.

In the last year, President Obama and the U.S. Congress have given meaning to that commitment by providing Israel with military assistance, by enabling joint military exercises and by working on joint missile defence.

So, too, Israel has been a staunch and steadfast ally of the United States. As Vice-President [Joe] Biden said, America has no better friend in the community of nations than Israel. For decades, Israel served as a bulwark against Soviet expansionism. Today it is helping America stem the tide of militant Islam. Israel shares with America everything we know about fighting a new kind of enemy.

We share intelligence. We co-operate in countless other ways that I am not at liberty to divulge. This co-operation is important for Israel and is helping save American lives. Our soldiers and your soldiers fight against fanatic enemies that loathe our common values…

This fanaticism's hatred of western civilization predates Israel's establishment by over 1,000 years.

Militant Islam does not hate the West because of Israel. It hates Israel because of the West – because it sees Israel as an outpost of freedom and democracy that prevents them from overrunning the Middle East. That is why when Israel stands against its enemies, it stands against America's enemies.

President Harry Truman, the first leader to recognize Israel, said this: "I have faith in Israel and I believe that it has a glorious future – not just as another sovereign nation, but as an embodiment of the great ideals of our civilization."

We are gathered here today because we believe in those common ideals.

And because of those ideals, I am certain that Israel and America will always stand together.

Opinions

It's hard to be a Reform Zionist

First it was the attacks on the Women of the Wall that stirred us to action. The Toronto Board of Rabbis issued a statement in their support, and I was pleased to add my name to it. Even mainstream Orthodoxy has come to realize that it's no longer possible to deny women their religious rights.

Rabbi Dow Marmur in Toronto

Then it was the proposed change in Israeli legislation about Jewish status. Although it's supposed to serve the interests of some disenfranchised citizens from the former Soviet Union, it's likely to make things even worse for all who are unwilling or unable to submit to the dictates of the Israeli rabbinic establishment.

Again, non-Orthodox Jews in the Diaspora protested because Jews by choice – converted by Reform, Conservative and even Orthodox rabbis – may now not be recognized as Jews in the Jewish state. Things are bad now, but the changes will make them worse.

All such protests are, therefore, legitimate. But they've a bad effect on the Diaspora's commitment to Israel. If women are persuaded that they cannot pray at Judaism's holiest place as equals, and if the growing number of Jews by choice (along with their offspring and relatives) are said to be discriminated against, why would they want to have anything to do with Israel?

Ironically, ostensible efforts to keep Israel Jewish have come to bar a growing number of Jews from wanting to live there or support it. This in turn may result in helping Israel to become a kind of Jewish version of a Taliban state in which the haredim dominate.

Zionists are thus in a bind. If they accept the growing dominance of the haredim in Israel, they're colluding with the possible demise of Israel as a Jewish democratic state. If they protest too loudly, they're putting off their potential constituents from commitment and support. The only way out of the dilemma, it seems, is to act with characteristic Jewish schizophrenia: fight those who seek to undermine Israel from within while urging potential victims to ignore restrictions and keep on supporting it.

As a Reform Zionist, my schizophrenia is especially acute. Accepting that an ever-growing number of Jews in the Diaspora will marry out, the Reform and to some extent the Conservative movements are doing what they can to make conversion accessible. They also seek to integrate intermarried families into their congregations. This, of course, is grist for the mill to the reactionaries in Israel.

It's difficult enough to be Jewish, but to be Zionist and Reform is particularly hard.

The seder as a model for Jewish education

Here we are, well into Pesach 5770, once again amazed at the brilliance of the rabbis in establishing a teaching tool as effective as the seder. One might think that Pesach is the very best example of "Jewish continuity," that motto of organized communities around the globe. In fact, though, Pesach and its seders are an illustration of why "Jewish continuity" is the wrong banner for ongoing and meaningful Jewish life. I know I've ranted on this theme before, but permit me to use this wonderful holiday to illustrate my point.

Seymour Epstein in Toronto

The rabbis of the first few centuries of the Common Era recognized the enormity of the task ahead of them. After the destruction of the Temple in Jerusalem (70 CE), they had to find a way to replace Temple sacrifice with prayer – to use their language, to replace the service of the Temple with the service of the heart. Whatever they created had to be authentic in relation to the past, relevant to the present and sustainable into the future.

In the case of Pesach, the Torah was very clear that both the message and the spirit of the primal "Pesach of Egypt" had to be transmitted over the centuries by means of the "Pesach of Generations." (See Exodus, Chapter 12.) But a significant part of the Torah's commandments regarding Pesach centre around the paschal lamb offering, reminiscent of the roasted lamb eaten that strange night in Egypt. How was that sacrifice to be re-engineered in a post-Temple era?

As we know, the rabbis knew Greek culture, appreciated certain aspects of Hellenism, and incorporated many Greek words into their own language. (See Saul Lieberman's classic Greek in Jewish Palestine/Hellenism in Jewish Palestine if you have any doubts.) They definitely knew of the evening banquet customs of Greek gentlemen. If you would like a description of such parties, read Plato's Symposium. You will find a description of a dinner party and the discussions at that banquet, which have nothing to do with the seder as we know it. The rabbis, however, did see a form and structure that they could use, if adapted properly to their educational needs. They transformed a dinner party form that the general populace recognized, and that perhaps some even attended, into a new Pesach ritual that took the authentic, ancient messages of Pesach and communicated in new forms that were relevant to the Jews of the time.

In doing so, they gave us all a certain degree of licence to continue being creative in interpretation and communication for centuries to come. It's no accident that what appears near the end of the seder is the afikoman, a linguistic loan from epikomion, which is Greek for after-dinner entertainment. And similarly, it's by design that the rabbis transformed a Greek custom that, at times, degenerated into a simple dessert ending of the seder meal, albeit one that kept the children awake long enough to take in the entire educational event. The experiential parts of the seder that complement the textual recitation are an ancient rabbinic precursor to everything we now know about multiple intelligences and our different capacities for learning.

Brilliant as this all is, the real message to us is one of rejecting mere continuity (a luxury the rabbis didn't have) and opting for creative growth and constant adaptation. This is how the rabbis built in future sustainability. They gave us a protocol in Pesach and in many other domains of our spiritual life for deep respect for ancient messages and just as much honour to the need for relevance to the current generation of Jews. If we follow their example in creativity, we will ensure a proud and courageous future for Jews and Judaism. Have a meaningful Pesach! Moadim lesimchah!

Maternal kashrut masoret gives way on Pesach

Because my grandmother never allowed garlic in her kitchen on Pesach, my mother taught my sister and me that it was forbidden on the holiday. She explained to us, as Bubbe had undoubtedly explained to her, that because in the eastern Europe home of her childhood, garlic was dried above the fire where cooking was done all year, it was presumed to have come into contact with foodstuff and so was not permitted on Passover.

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

One year, budding chefs that we were, my sister and I rebelled. Our garlic isn't dried over the fireplace or in the hearth, we argued. (Our New York home had neither.) Our garlic came to us in narrow glass jars, already ground into a fine powder. Not only that, but its label proclaimed it fit for Passover consumption. So why could we not use it to flavour our Pesach dishes?

Our logic was impeccable, our campaign impassioned. It took a few years, but eventually my mother yielded. Our holiday cuisine improved, became more complex and savoury, as we availed ourselves not only of garlic, but of whatever spices came in appropriately marked bottles. There were other foods my grandmother had banned from her Pesach kitchen, but many of them were available in North America with a Passover seal of approval. They, too, found a place in our kitchen. The authorities in charge of such things seemed to have a wider Passover palate than Bubbe. It was truly a new world.

Years later, researching food traditions of eastern European Jewish homes, particularly regarding Passover, I came to understand that my bubbe's kitchen traditions were not simply her own invention, shaped by the configuration of her home and her family's taste. Rather, they were a part of the tradition of her shtetl, which allowed certain foodstuffs and forbade others on Passover.

Eastern Europe, it turns out, was a patchwork of such traditions, with variations of what one may and may not eat varying by micro-region, by affiliation with particular rebbes, and sometimes by clan. The minute shadings operated region by region, sometimes shtetl by shtetl.

What to bring into one's home, what and how to cook, was a masoret, a tradition of kashrut learned at the hearth, passed down among generations of women, grandmother and mother to daughter and granddaughter. When in doubt, there were local authorities to consult, but by and large, women knew their stuff, and they trained their female progeny in situ.

Today, in Canada and in the United States, that home-based tradition has been largely supplanted by the centralization of authorities on kashrut, who affix labels for all to see . Look on the web – you can find lists of what's cool and what's not for Passover kitchens.

By the time my sister and I were growing up, these two sources of food knowledge were operating side by side – competing, in a sense, for loyalties. Confronted with Bubbe's tradition, on the one hand, and the centralized, homogenized North American lists, on the other, we opted for the lists and jettisoned the maternal masoret. We were not unique in this. By now, the idea of centralized authority has largely prevailed, creating a uniformity among immigrants and their progeny who may have inherited different ancestral traditions.

There is, of course, a gain in this. Foods my Bubbe never heard of might be on the right list (although, over time, some foods she permitted have been forbidden). The diverse origins of Canadian and American Jews meld into a few strong bodies of tradition. It also helps to equalizes Jews by choice, who have no inherited maternal kashrut to tap into.

But there's also a loss, notably the authority of mothers and grandmothers in what was traditionally their domain. In retrospect, my sister and I should have clung to Bubbe's traditions instead of so eagerly embracing the modern. The imposition of official bodies of authority over the maternal masoret minimizes the authority of women as keepers of the kosher hearth. It also erases history.

When our maternal traditions dictated our kitchen habits, as you ate, you tasted where you came from.

Obama is doling out tough love

Israel's strategic relationship with the United States, rocked by an impolitic Israeli announcement during U.S. Vice-President Joe Biden's visit to Israel, remains strained.

The incident that severely buffeted Israel's relations with its single most important ally began last month when the Israeli interior ministry approved the construction of 1,600 housing units in eastern Jerusalem's Ramat Shlomo neighbourhood without bothering to inform Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

The announcement precipitated a political storm, prompting an embarrassed Biden to condemn it and a chastened Netanyahu to apologize for the timing. At President Barack Obama's behest, U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton sharply criticized Israel, while his close adviser, David Axelrod, accused Israel of undermining the prospects for restarting talks with the Palestinians. As the row escalated, Israel's ambassador to Washington called it the worst crisis in Israeli-American relations in three decades

Washington's stinging rebuke of Israel was triggered by the troubling suspicion that Netanyahu's right-of-centre government might not be sincerely committed to peace, or a two-state solution, with the Palestinian Authority, which envisages eastern Jerusalem as the capital of a future Palestinian nation. To the Obama administration, the peaceful resolution of the Arab-Israeli conflict is a prerequisite for stabilizing the region, containing Iran and its allies – Hezbollah and Hamas – and improving the United States' standing in the Arab and Muslim worlds.

By last week, Israel and the United States appeared to have made some headway in patching up their quarrel after Netanyahu's decision to announce confidence-building measures relating to the Palestinians, Obama's characterization of Israel as "one of our closest allies," Clinton's declaration that U.S. support for Israel is"rock solid, unwavering, enduring and forever," and George Mitchell's return to Israel. Mitchell, the U.S. special envoy to the Middle East, hopes to launch "proximity," or indirect negotiations, between Israel and the Palestinian Authority as soon as possible, though such talks are still far off.

Capping off his efforts to defuse the tension, Obama met with Netanyahu on March 23 at the White House. But they failed to resolve their differences. Indeed, a White House press spokesperson said that Israeli building activity in eastern Jerusalem is "destructive" to the peace process. And there were fears in Israel that Washington may try to impose a solution.

What seems crystal clear is that, almost a month after the damaging Ramat Shlomo blowup, Israel and the United States continue to sharply disagree on the status of eastern Jerusalem

Regarding Jerusalem as its "indivisible and undivided" capital, though not even its friends recognize it, Israel considers the eastern half – populated mainly by Palestinian Arabs, annexed in 1967 and enlarged by land expropriations from the West Bank – as an integral component of the city. "As far as we are concerned, building in Jerusalem is like building in Tel Aviv," said Netanyahu on March 21 in a reiteration of his policy.

The United States believes that the ultimate fate of eastern Jerusalem should be settled through negotiations. Agreeing with a formula advanced by former U.S. president Bill Clinton, the Obama administration holds that Jewish and Arab neighbourhoods in the disputed eastern sector should respectively be controlled by Israel and the Palestinians once a peace treaty is signed. In addition, the two sides cannot agree whether Jewish neighbourhoods in eastern Jerusalem built after the Six Day War are "settlements."

Last week, Netanyahu asserted yet again that they are an organic part of Jerusalem. But since some of these neighbourhoods were constructed on land originally in the West Bank, the United States and Israel are not on the same page.

Clinton, in a speech to the American Israel Public Affairs Committee on March 22, warned that Israel's policy of building apartments in eastern Jerusalem and settlements in the West Bank are hurting U.S. efforts to get talks going. Beyond this contentious issue, Clinton warned that the status quo in the Middle East is "unsustainable," which is nothing new. George Shultz, the U.S. secretary of state under Ronald Reagan, used similar language in the 1980s to describe the volatile situation in the region. Clinton also put Israel on notice that she would speak out against Israeli decisions viewed as inimical to peace.

Clinton did not deliver her pointed critique in a vacuum. A survey released by the Rasmussen Reports polling company recently found that 49 per cent of Americans are of the opinion that Israel should be forced to cease all settlement building. Only 22 per cent of respondents disagreed with that notion.

And in what may be seen as an implicit warning aimed at Israel, Gen. David Petraeus, the commander of U.S. forces in the Middle East, said that the Arab-Israeli dispute [presents] "distinct challenges to our ability to advance our interests" in the Mideast.

The Obama administration's policy is backed by the Quartet, which consists of the United States, Russia, the United Nations and the European Union.

Two weeks ago, the Quartet called upon Israel to freeze "all settlement activities," condemned Israel's approval of the Ramat Shlomo project and urged Israel and the Palestinian Authority to renew peace talks to achieve a two-state solution within 24 months.

Israel's foreign minister, Avigdor Lieberman, rejected that timetable as artificial and unrealistic. Judging by Lieberman's assessment, Israel and the United States may well clash again in the future.

Yet, as Michael Oren, Israel's envoy in Washington, has written, Israel and the United States "enjoy a deep and multi-layered friendship, but even the closest allies can sometimes disagree."

In 1953, the Eisenhower administration suspended economic aid to Israel in protest over a hydroelectric plant on the Jordan River. After the 1956 Sinai War, the United States coerced Israel to withdraw from the Sinai Peninsula. The Kennedy administration upset Israel by flirting with the "right of return" concept for Palestinian refugees and by insisting that Israel's nuclear facilities should be inspected by outside powers.

When the Six Day War broke out, the Johnson administration stirred apprehension in Israel by stating that the United States was neutral. The Nixon administration announced that changes in the 1967 borders "should not reflect the weight of conquest."

In 1975, the Ford administration embarked on a "reassessment" of U.S. policy and refused to sign new arms agreements with Israel. The Reagan administration condemned Israel's destruction of Iraq's nuclear reactor and suspended the delivery of F-16 jets to Israel during the first Lebanon War. The Carter administration urged Israel to withdraw to the pre-1967 lines. The first Bush administration froze $10 billion in loan guarantees to Israel.

Despite these jarring incidents, Israel has managed to deepen its bilateral ties with the United States, given their range of shared values and interests.

The same might be said of Israel's relationship with Obama. Though it has frayed of late, the United States is deeply committed to Israel's survival as a Jewish state and has provided Israel with strong political, military and economic backing. The barbed remark by Israeli Sports and Culture Minister Limor Livnat last November that Israel has "fallen into the hands of a horrible American administration" is simply inaccurate and untrue.

Obama is simply doling out tough love.

Students foster identity through written word

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Adira Winegust believes in the power of the written word.

Especially when expressing her Jewish identity.

"I would love to be part of the next generation of Jewish writers," said Winegust, a second-year arts and science student at McMaster University. "Showing Jewish identity through anywhere is good, but writing and arts is a really creative way… Writing tends to be an outlet and therapy for a lot of people."

This is one of the reasons that she submitted her work to an Internet publication called Milim, a Jewish literary magazine started by the Canadian Federation of Jewish Students (CFJS).

"I wrote a poem and sent it off to them. I love writing, and I thought this would be a unique opportunity," she said, adding that her poem, called Blessing, explores the feeling of being on the men's side of her synagogue with her father.

The magazine itself, which includes poetry, stories, artwork and photography, was launched as an outlet for students such as Winegust, who express themselves through the creative arts.

Josh Kelikovitz, the editor-in-chief of the Internet literary magazine Milim

Josh Kelikovitz, the chair of Jewish Identity for CFJS, got the idea for a literary magazine last fall. Right now, Milim is in its first phase – its website was launched several months ago and editors are currently accepting submissions. The ultimate goal is to eventually produce a physical publication.

"I've always had an interest in Jewish literature and Jewish arts," said Kelikovitz, who is the magazine's editor-in-chief. "I think it [Milim offers] a broader way for people to express what it means to be a Canadian Jewish student."

Kelikovitz would like to update the website with new submissions every three weeks or so, he said, adding that any submissions must contain Jewish content.

For Kelikovitz, the magazine is a way to reach students nationwide who may not be part of Hillel or their local Jewish student associations.

"[Milim is] a way to engage new segments of Jewish students that may not have been engaged by previous programming… Art and literature can open up doors to students," he said. "This is another way for people to get involved."

Writer Adira Winegust

Samantha Banks, the president of CFJS, agrees.

"I believe it's a good forum because it taps into an aspect of Judaism which isn't always addressed," she said of the magazine. "There are a lot of students in the fine arts industry that maybe haven't found an outlet to connect to Judaism. This allows them to take the art that they foster and love, and put it into a publication that can be viewed and valued by students all across Canada."

Allison Vanek, Milim's poetry and fiction editor and a third-year English and drama student at Queen's University, sees the publication as a way for students to connect through their work.

"It reaches not just one campus, not just one city, but across all campuses, across all cities," she said. "We're trying to bring people together from different areas who may not have had the ability to share experiences with each other… [and] share their ideas and their work."

As an English major, Vanek understands the importance of the written word.

"I believe that no matter what your identity is, the written word is the way to go to express it," she said. "I think it's really important that there are still literary publications that can be accessed."

When reviewing submissions, Vanek looks for content that other students can connect to, she said.

"That can be any kind of style or subject, as long as it's something that has some kind of human connection," she said.

Regaining some perspective on Jerusalem

Can Israel be covered journalistically with equanimity – that is, a sense of calmness and perspective? Or is it the country's fate often to be the object of disproportionate and emotionally charged attention?

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

If the torrent of media criticism of Israel's admittedly awful handling of the Ramot Shlomo affair was marked by anything, it was a general loss of perspective. Once again, settlements have become not just one of the key, knotty final-status issues, but "the" impediment to peace.

Speaking from Ramallah on March 20, UN Secretary General Ban Ki-Moon, condemned Israeli housing in east Jerusalem and said, "Let us be clear: all settlement activity is illegal anywhere in occupied territory, and this must stop."

This occasioned the BBC to report that from an observation point on the outskirts of Ramallah, Ban looked towards "the Israeli West Bank settlement of Givat Zeev, home to 11,000 Israelis."

That's right, the Israeli neighbourhood in northern Jerusalem, just over the Green Line, has now become a West Bank settlement. While one might have come to expect such characterization from major elements of the British and European media, the same could not have been said of the U.S. media.

Yet, in a March 24 front page New York Times story on the continuing tension between U.S. President Barack Obama and Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, Helen Cooper and Mark Landler wrote that ties between the two leaders suffered "after [Netanyahu's] government's decision this month to approve new Jewish settlements in east Jerusalem."

Let's be clear: if Jewish housing in Jerusalem anywhere east of the Green Line (that is, the 1949 Armistice line with Jordan) is now to be termed a "settlement," it follows that the Jewish Quarter of the Old City, which is also over the Green Line, must also be considered a "settlement."

But would any fair-minded journalist write that? If not, why not?

Raising these questions shows the extent to which a rising tide of disapproval in the West of the Israeli government is leading to the obscuring of basic facts and common sense.

It's important to note that while there's a strong Israeli consensus against physically redividing Jerusalem – in its 3,000-year history it was only physically divided for 19 years of Jordanian rule, from 1949 to 1967 – Israel has shown remarkable willingness to compromise with the Palestinians on the city – twice in fact: once in 2000-01 at Camp David/Taba and again in 2007 under the Annapolis plan.

In both cases, the Palestinian leadership rejected compromise. The rejection had nothing to do with Jewish housing, which continuedduring both negotiations. Rather it had to do with the Palestinian rejection of Jewish legitimacy in any part of the city. Is it any wonder then that Israelis remain leery of the subject? Or that there is a small majority that supports building in Jewish neighbourhoods in the eastern part of the city that under any (possible) future compromise will almost certainly remain part of Israel?

In an article in the March 23 Jerusalem Post, Avi Dichter, Kadima MK and former head of the Shin Bet, expressed a balanced Israeli view: "[T]he world must clearly understand that Jerusalem will not return to the pre-1967 borders," he wrote. Still, "[w]hile this is a clear and important strategic policy in the heart of [the] consensus in Israel, the government needs to be more tactically sensitive in its building plans for Jerusalem."

Even the influential Economist magazine (a publication not known for its sympathetic coverage of Israel) acknowledged the need for a sensible approach to the subject of the Green Line. In the midst of its criticism of Netanyahu in its March 18 editorial "Stop the bungling," it managed to calmly give cause for optimism.

One reason for "cautious hope," it wrote, "is that mainstream Israelis and Palestinians agree that an adjustment of the 1967 border, including equitable land swaps to compensate the Palestinians, is inevitable in any durable peace deal. If the border issue were resolved early in negotiations, much of the poison over the continuing building of Jewish settlements would be drawn, because the biggest of them would fall on the Israeli side of the new line, even along parts of east Jerusalem's rim."

If a British publication can recognize this possibility, perhaps not all reason has been lost.

Paul Michaels is communications director for the Canada-Israel Committee.

Staying true to your roots

By DANIELLE SCHEINMAN
Special to The CJN

Growing up in a predominantly Jewish neighbourhood, attending Jewish day school and spending my summers at Jewish summer camps left me nothing short of sheltered.

I had few non-Jewish friends until university – and even then, the majority were the same friends I grew up with. I have always been part of a close-knit community where everyone celebrated the same holidays, ate the same bagels and cream cheese and hung out at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto-sponsored events. When my camping career came to an end, I chose to intern at a Jewish organization, as opposed to entering the ever-so-daunting "real world." I felt comfortable knowing everyone around me had something in common. Fridays were early closings because of Shabbat. Phrases such as "B'hatzlachah" and "Toda rabah" were considered to be part of normal office conversation.

After four years of university and obtaining a postgraduate certificate in public relations and corporate communications, I decided to take the leap. For the past two years, I have been working at a public relations agency in downtown Toronto where, as you probably guessed, I am the sole Jew.

I was nervous to enter an environment where I wasn't automatically connected to my colleagues by a common bond, but excited to break out of my shell and meet new professionals in my field – no matter their age, race or religion.

My Jewishness was quickly made apparent to my colleagues by the Magen David I proudly wore around my neck and the Hebrew/Yiddish words that unconsciously slipped out of my mouth. I said "Mazel tov" instead of "Congratulations" for a new client win and "Oy gevalt" instead of "Oh no" when my computer malfunctioned. I didn't hide the fact that I was Jewish – rather I embraced it and so did my colleagues.

They were curious and interested to learn about Jewish traditions, foods and holidays. One colleague wanted to get it straight, "Is Chanukah the holiday with the matzah or is that Passover?" and another co-worker was ever so intrigued by the leftover farfel I kept bringing for lunch. When we had our Christmas decorating challenge, I decorated my area with dreidels and menorahs (I won the multi-cultural award!), and when we picked a charity of our choice during the Christmas season, I consistently supported Jewish charities.

Despite being the only Jewish employee, I've remained proud and connected to my Jewish roots and have taught others about my religion in the process. I'm still teaching them that Bubbie's chicken soup really can cure the common cold, grocery-store bagels are not real bagels, and a rugelach is so much better than a doughnut from Tim Hortons.

The past two years have provided me with unique experiences that have allowed me to grow personally and professionally. Although there still might be a few differences between my current job and my past jobs, I'm fostering a sense of understanding and tolerance among my fellow colleagues – and in today's world, that can make all the difference.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Not all Sephardim eat rice on Pesach

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

One fundamental difference between the diet of Ashkenazim and Sephardim is well known and documented.

While the Torah specified five grains – wheat, oats, spelt, rye and barley – as comprising the five types of chametz, somewhere in Diaspora history, rabbis of certain communities chose to extend this list and categorize kitniyot, or legumes, such as rice, millet, beans, lentils, peas, corn, buckwheat and many others, as being unacceptable Pesach foods.

It wasn't because these are in any way chametz in and of themselves, but rather, since these all share some common characteristics with the five grains, they, too, are to be avoided in order to minimize confusion.

The common characteristics are that both grains and legumes can be ground into a fine flour from which one then can produce cereals, bread, rice cakes and other baked goods. All would be dropped from the menus of an Ashkenazi table on Pesach. This safeguard was, and is, universally the norm for all Ashkenazi Jews.

No such concern was voiced by leaders of the Sephardi community in the Diaspora, and, therefore, these legumes were and continue to be a part of their traditional and acceptable Pesach diet.

There is however another fundamental difference in customs that is not so well known or documented – the eating of rice on Pesach.

Apparently, this commodity, while almost a staple in Middle Eastern cuisine, and very much a part of the Pesach holiday menu, is not at all to be found on the tables of North African Sephardi homes.

For North African Sephardim, rice is a definite no-go area.

But why would this one particular legume be singled out by Sephardim of North African decent?

North African rabbis never banned rice. Certainly this custom is nowhere recorded, nor is it given official sanction.

It seems that the aversion to rice began quite logically.

Not being a domestic product, rice, a very sought-after delicacy, was imported into North Africa. The imported rice came in recycled burlap sacks that had more often than once contained flour. Hence, kosher for Pesach rice was unavailable.

So, it turns out that for very practical reasons, not all Sephardim eat rice on Pesach.

Counting on spiritual growth

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

It's somewhat ironic that on the second night of Pesach, with the holiday barely under way, Jews are already beginning to prepare themselves for yet another festival. Sfirat HaOmer, the period of counting the Omer, culminates seven weeks later with Shavuot. This time of year is a fascinating one, long associated with spiritual, even kabbalistic growth.

Just what is an "Omer?" According to the Torah, an offering consisting of an Omer (a specific measure) of barley was brought to the Temple on the second day of Passover. [bit.ly/omer01] Until that offering was made, no grain from the new year's crop was to be eaten. From that day onward, it was necessary to count 49 days until Shavuot, the Festival of the Wheat Harvest (Leviticus 23:15). [bit.ly/omer02]

After the destruction of the Temple, the practice of bringing barley was discontinued, but Jews continued to count during the Omer period. The kabbalists' interpretation of these 49 days was based on the various permutations (seven times seven) of the sfirot, or mystical emanations. These sfirot denote the ascent from the 49 "gates" of impurity of the Egyptian bondage to the purity of the Revelation at Sinai. Each day and week is given its own mystical attribute such as chesed (lovingkindness), gevurah (restraint) and tiferet (beauty). [bit.ly/omer03]

For example, the phrase for the fourth day of counting is hod shel chesed or endurance in lovingkindness. Aish.com poses these questions in relation to the day: "Is my love enduring? Do I give and withhold love according to my moods or is it constant regardless of the ups and downs of life? Exercise for the day: reassure a loved one of the constancy of your love." [bit.ly/omer04] You can read essays about the various permutations and how each of the 49 days has its own unique quality. [bit.ly/omer05]

For Rabbi Malka Drucker, counting the days infuses them with spiritual – and practical – significance. "When I count the Omer, my intention is to empty myself of the day's irritations, its problems, even its joys. I do this by becoming conscious of how the day has been spent, and this process helps me to think of the evening as a prelude for the morning." [bit.ly/omer06]

As for the count itself, there are rules about when to do it (after dark), how to do it (best while standing) and what to do if you miscount (it's complicated – read the website). [bit.ly/omer15] Rabbis have even pondered how to keep your count straight if you happen to cross the international date line and your personal count differs from everyone around you. [bit.ly/omer07]

Whether you're a world traveller or a just a typical commuter, downloading the Sfirat HaOmer app for iPhone or iPod Touch will help make sure you're counting the right day. [bit.ly/omer08] The Omer program for the Palm goes one better, with an alarm that will remind you to count daily. [bit.ly/omer09] And you can sign up at sites such as the Orthodox Union [bit.ly/ omer16] and Torah.org [bit.ly/omer11] to get a daily reminder via e-mail.

Or you can keep track the old-fashioned way. Just print an Omer calendar and stick it on the fridge. David Wallach has posted a handy one-page version [bit.ly/omer12], and if you need help with Hebrew, there's a version transliterated into English. [bit.ly/omer13]

And in a case of old meets new, take a look at "The Homer Calendar." [bit.ly/omer14] Keeping track of the daily count can be a bit confusing, but if H'Omer Simpson can do it, with the help of the venerable Rabbi Hyman Krustofski, so can you. Just remember, if you forget to count the Omer for an entire day, you can continue to count on subsequent days, but you can no longer recite the blessing. D'oh!

The decline of Israeli Apartheid Week

In recent Canadian history, Canada has strived to be accepting of all races and creeds, and multiculturalism and tolerance are said to be of great importance to our culture.

In fact, multiculturalism was a major theme of the recent Winter Olympics in Vancouver. Events such as Israeli Apartheid Week are a threat to multiculturalism.

On Campus
By Justin Dahan

Liberal leader Michael Ignatieff recently spoke about Israeli Apartheid Week (IAW), saying it "betrays the values of mutual respect that Canada has always promoted." He believes that IAW "should be condemned by all who value civil and respectful debate about the tragic conflict in the Middle East."

With politicians, both Liberal and Conservative, denouncing Israeli Apartheid Week, it has started to decline in popularity. It's unlikely that IAW will be abolished, but the demonstrations this year have been low key compared to other years.

That being said, there is still an Israeli Apartheid Week, which is not ideal, but this year's events were less radical, and there was less blatant anti-Semitism. IAW at certain Canadian universities, such as York University, has been known to be worse than at others. In the past, York students have been the victims of intimidation, and anti-Semitic graffiti has appeared on campus.

We are still a long way from Israeli Apartheid Week being banned from campuses, but it seems that we are heading in the right direction.

In Ottawa, at Carleton University and the University of Ottawa, Israeli Apartheid Week was not a large-scale event. It was definitely there, but a student-run Jewish organization called the Israel Advocacy Committee (IAC) is active on campus.

Throughout the school year, the IAC's job is to promote Israel and shed a positive light on the Jewish homeland for students whose main information source on the subject may be the organizers of Israeli Apartheid Week.

The president of IAC in Ottawa is Laura Grosman. She helps to organize events including tabling – students volunteering to spend a day on the popular areas of campus promoting Israel.

It is through these types of events that anti-Zionist and anti-Semitic sentiment can be fought. In the past, we have lost the battle before it started, as we did not educate the masses. Many college and university students are impressionable, and are easily swayed by words such as "apartheid."

With groups such as the IAC around to promote Israel, it is possible to imagine that soon Israeli Apartheid Week will be even less effective and less prominent. We are heading to a time when a combination of student groups and active politicians will continue to protest IAW.

I am optimistic that students will soon know the simple pleasure of not having to deal with the ignorance and propaganda that are associated with Israeli Apartheid week.

Education isn't just for kids

Shortly after my grandmother moved into Baycrest, I was asked to lead a Passover seder for the residents. I prepared intensely, gathering anecdotes and commentaries, planning songs and stories. The seder went off without a hitch. The residents sang, asked questions and enjoyed themselves, but it was my own internal debate that was the most educational part of the experience.

Class Act
By Daniel Held

During the seder I reflected. "Wow! What an incredible setting for education. The residents are engaged, interested and participating. They're not only a captive audience, but they're so excited by the interaction with a young person that they're enlivened by the seder. This really is an ideal setting for Jewish education."

Content with my validation of the experience I continued on. Shortly, however, I had a second thought. "These seniors aren't going to be teaching the lessons they learn tonight. They aren't raising children or running seders of their own. The learning will likely end here."

I trudged through the seder, concerned about the purpose. Could this be true? Was Jewish education in the context of a seniors residence a waste? Finally, a third internal monologue clarified my thoughts. "Jewish learning itself is enriching. Studying a text or singing a song adds value to our lives. Jewish education is not, and cannot, only be about the next generation. Rather, it must be about the learners themselves – inspiring them, engaging them and enriching their lives."

We often perceive education as a venture for the young. We invest heavily in schools and camps, Hillels and Birthright Israel. Of the estimated $4-billion venture that is our educational system in North America, how much is spent on the youngest third of our population?

Moreover, our evaluation tools highlight the elusive search for continuity. Study after study argues that day schools stave off intermarriage, that Birthright alumni are more likely to donate to Jewish causes, and that, upon their return in August, campers are more likely to light Shabbat candles. These markers of identity, while valuable in the search to count Jewish action, do little to demonstrate the intrinsic value of Jewish learning and living.

If we view Jewish education solely as a vehicle for ensuring a Jewish tomorrow, we deprive ourselves of Torah lishma – learning for learning's sake.

Synagogues take the brunt of this blow. Shuls are often seen as little more than venues for Hebrew school and bar and bat mitzvahs. When these youth education ventures are complete, how many families continue coming to shul? How many renew their membership?

Finally, let's consider holiday celebrations. Many years ago, a professor and mentor of mine introduced me to the term "pediatric Judaism." It's easy to transform the lighting of Chanukah candles, the reading of the megillah and the Passover seder into children's activities. As a teacher, I know how valuable these activities are for both children and parents. It's much harder – but I believe equally enriching – to frame these events as meaningful and fulfilling for adults.

In the Haggadah, we read about Rabbi Eliezer, Rabbi Yehoshua, Rabbi Elazar the son of Azariah, Rabbi Akiva and Rabbi Tarfon. Like my grandmother and her neighbours at Baycrest, they gathered to retell the story of Passover together. They didn't do it for their children or grandchildren. They didn't do it for the sake of continuity. They spent the night retelling the story of Passover because they believed that Jewish learning itself is an enriching endeavour – no matter what your age.

Learning from my seder participants at Baycrest, it's time to shift the paradigm of education from a focus on the continuity of the next generation to the enrichment and growth of the learner – at any age, level of learning or stage of life.

Day affirms Canada's support of Israel

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Stockwell Day, president of the Treasury Board and minister for the Asia-Pacific Gateway, recently affirmed Canada's unwavering support for the State of Israel.

He was speaking at the 2009 Jewish National Fund (JNF) Negev Dinner, held at the Fairmont Chateau Laurier Hotel on March 22.

Nearly 500 people packed the hotel's ballroom to honour local philanthropist Sara Vered, a native Israeli who fought in Israel's 1948 War of Independence.

Day praised Vered's war service. "You did your duty, and you did it with remarkable courage," he said.

He told the audience that Vered was "one of the key people involved in the first trip that [former prime minister John] Diefenbaker took to Israel. He came home from that trip and his support for Israel never wavered."

Day said he was moved by all he had seen during his most recent trip to Israel. He gave his assurance that Canada is firmly behind Israel. "Any time Israel is threatened, for Canada neutrality will never be an option," he said.

Sara and her husband, the late Zeev Vered, came to Canada as students to attend McGill University. Soon afterward, they moved to Ottawa, where they founded several companies and raised three sons, who are all involved in the family businesses.

As the Vereds' businesses prospered, they became volunteers in the community and major philanthropists, contributing to organizations in the Jewish and general communities in Ottawa, as well as to Israel.

Miriam Ziv, ambassador of Israel to Canada and two former Israeli ambassadors – Alan Baker and David Sultan – attended the dinner. Baker and Sultan came from Israel to support their friend. Numerous local politicians, dignitaries and business leaders were there as well.

Sara Vered spoke poignantly of her life in Israel. "How thankful I am to my parents who left Europe to come to Palestine, hoping to build a new life," she said. She told of her childhood in Jerusalem, of being taken out of high school to work in a wireless station, returning to school to write the final exam, and then being sent to the front, where she served during the War of Independence.

"By jeep, I travelled to the Negev and fell in love with this magnificent country... I learned that each individual and each nation should have a vision – a vision that contributes to the welfare of humanity," she said.

With the funds raised by the dinner, the area around Ben-Gurion's Cabin in the Sara and Zeev Vered Pioneer Grounds will be landscaped. The cabin is a tourist attraction. The landscaping will include a path, benches and a variety of trees and shrubs symbolizing the former Israeli prime minister's vision of greening the desert.

A portion of the proceeds will also go to the Ran Kochva Lookout, developed by the JNF as a living memorial to Maj. Ran Kochva, a pilot killed in action during the Second Lebanon War in 2006. Located in Nabi Yosha Forest in the Naftali Mountains, the location where Kochva's helicopter crashed, the lookout has views of the waters of the Hula Agamon.

Russian emigrée was a champion of Wallenberg

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The Russian emigrée Vera Parnes, an accomplished medical researcher in her native country, devoted her last 20 years to commemorating Raoul Wallenberg. She died March 24 following a brief illness. She was 91.

Obituary

Parnes left Moscow in 1991 and, after a brief time in San Francisco, settled in Montreal, where she founded the Canadian Friends of Raoul Wallenberg and the Raoul Wallenberg International Movement for Humanity (RWIMH).

During the era of perestroika (increasing social freedoms) under Soviet Prime Minister Mikhail Gorbachev, she opened a small museum in Moscow devoted to the Swedish diplomat Wallenberg, who is credited with saving tens of thousands of Jews in Budapest from Nazi deportation during World War II.

She then formed the Raoul Wallenberg Society, which organized cultural events and lectures, and appealed to Gorbachev to disclose records pertaining to Wallenberg's fate – to no avail.

Although alone and no longer young, Parnes decided to emigrate because of the political chaos that ensued after the collapse of the Soviet Union.

In her new country, she was indefatigable in her efforts to establish the truth about what happened to Wallenberg who disappeared on Jan. 17, 1945, after being arrested by the Soviets. The Russians maintain that Wallenberg died of natural causes in a Soviet prison in July 1947.

One of her first projects was to erect a bust of Wallenberg in downtown Montreal in what is now Raoul Wallenberg Square. She organized at least one major event a year in Wallenberg's memory.

She also created The Wallenberg Bulletin and later a website providing the latest news on activities related to the Swedish hero.

In 2001, Parnes was instrumental, along with MPs Irwin Cotler, Sheila Copps and others, in having Parliament declare Jan. 17 Raoul Wallenberg Day. Wallenberg had been named Canada's first honorary citizen in 1985.

Verna Parnes

She worked internationally to encourage other countries to remember Wallenberg. One achievement was Budapest's naming him an honorary citizen.

Although Parnes was critical of Sweden for not doing more to investigate Wallenberg's whereabouts after the war, its monarch, King Carl XVI Gustaf, bestowed upon her the Royal Order of the Polar Star (First Class) in 2004.

Born in Moscow, she was a professor and researcher specializing in infectious diseases and cancer, and she did pioneering work in developing imaging devices for cancer diagnosis. She was married to the late Isaak Beilin, an agronomist and botanist.

Her biography also notes that during the Stalin era, she spoke out at her peril against anti-Semitism within the Academy of Medical Sciences and came to the defence of a colleague, the renowned immunologist Leo Silber.

Peter Rona, RWIMH's executive director, who worked with Parnes for 18 years, touched on her iron determination in his eulogy.

"Regardless how much you seemed to contribute, according to Vera, there was always more to do. She never let up, and she was never completely satisfied.

"Her typical answer would be: 'How do you compare anything to the efforts and accomplishments of Raoul Wallenberg?'"

Her work ethic, right to the end of her life, was astonishing. "At 90 years of age, [she was] up and working by her computer at 6 a.m., and sometimes still working at 9 p.m., using technology and e-mailing around the world."

Working for her was not always easy, but Rona's admiration only grew.

"She would boss me around, insisting that whatever she wanted accomplished, indeed gets accomplished... It always had to be done her way."

Like her mentor Wallenberg, Parnes showed that "one human being could make a difference," he said. "She touched and influenced hundreds, if not thousands, of lives with her fervent effort to keep the memory of Wallenberg alive."

Parnes is survived by a brother, Iakov Parnes, of Montreal and a nephew.

Cotler counters conservative blogger who called him a 'Jewish Uncle Tom'

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Liberal MP Irwin Cotler has been described many ways – as a human rights crusader, former justice minister, member of the Order of Canada and even the "Alan Dershowitz of the North."

But Cotler said he was taken aback and offended at the end of December when Jewish conservative blogger Ezra Levant devoted an entire blog to characterizing Cotler as a "Jewish Uncle Tom" and the "Uncle Tom of the Liberal Party."

According to the Levant blog, Cotler has put up with a party "that... abide[s] anti-Semitism and... anti-Israel sentiment" and hasn't been "noisy [enough] when his own party was selling Israel down the river."

Irwin Cotler

Ezra Levant

Levant, who is Jewish, also wrote that at a purported dinner meeting in Toronto "in 2002 or 2003," supposedly attended by Cotler, Levant, Senator Jerry Grafstein and the late media mogul Izzy Asper, Cotler allegedly portrayed Liberal stalwarts Eddie Goldenberg and Herb Gray as "official" and "court" Jews (Levant's terms) who, as loyalists to then-prime minister Jean Chrétien, didn't come to Israel's defence when they should have, and thereby signalled Chrétien's government to carry on with its middling support of Israel.

Now, Cotler has become the very thing he criticized, Levant wrote.

Asked about the blog at a recent press conference, Cotler said he was ambivalent about responding at first because – as his aide Howard Liebman put it – "that's what Ezra would have wanted."

But Cotler said he was nonetheless tempted to respond, "not because of me, but because of the implication that falsely represented what I said about other people."

Cotler's recollection of the meeting described is that it never happened, or if it did, he was not there.

"I was not a part of that alleged meeting," Cotler said adamantly. "Ezra Levant is a free speech person and is certainly entitled to free speech, but while he is entitled to his opinion, he's not entitled to rewrite the facts, and that's basically what he has done."

Cotler added that Asper, who died in October 2003, had been "a very, very close friend." The meeting "never took place, No. 1, and the statement [Levant] attributed to me... at that meeting was never said by me.

"I never would say anything about Herb Gray," Cotler continued. "I just spoke at a dinner honouring him. Why would I ever say things exactly opposite of the truth about someone I have so publicly extolled?"

Levant puts forward the idea that, as a Liberal, Cotler is "loyal to his masters" or stays acquiescent in caucus. This "is grossly false," Cotler said.

Cotler pointed to an article in the Jerusalem Report published in 2004, shortly after he was named justice minister. Headlined "A troublemaker tamed?" the article described how Cotler – then a backbencher – was not shy to exhort his own government to blacklist Islamic terrorist groups, something it did less than three weeks later when it declared Islamic Jihad and Hamas illegal.

Cotler said he has also publicly "stood up" to criticize Liberal leader Michael Ignatieff.

"It's all a matter of public record," Cotler said, noting that the Jerusalem Report story had also pointed out that it had once been thought Cotler's willingness to be critical of his own party could cost him a seat at the cabinet table.

Perhaps, ventured Cotler, "part of it has to do with the fact that I am a Liberal," and Levant's "disposition towards Liberals is that we all should be an endangered species."

Canadian diplomat's comments called 'odious'

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Comments last weekend by former Canadian diplomat Robert Fowler claiming that Canada's Middle East policy is based on narrow domestic political considerations have been slammed by the Canada-Israel Committee as "outrageous and odious."

Shimon Fogel, the CIC's chief executive officer, said in a statement:

"CIC views [Fowler's] comments… as both outrageous and odious."

He added, "Accusing the Jews of, in effect, controlling Canadian foreign policy heralds back to some of the most base anti-Semitic canards."

In a speech to the Liberal party in Montreal on Sunday, Fowler accused the Conservative government of pandering to Jewish voters and favouring Israel.

Fowler, Canada's former ambassador to the United Nations and a foreign policy adviser to prime ministers Pierre Trudeau, Brian Mulroney and John Turner, delivered his remarks at a "thinkers" conference attended by Michael Ignatieff, the current Liberal party leader, and Paul Martin, one of his predecessors and Canada's former prime minister.

In a tough appraisal of Prime Minister Stephen Harper's Mideast policy, Fowler said it panders to Jewish voters.

By doing so, the Conservatives "sell out our widely admired and long-established reputation for fairness and justice."

Faulting Canadian politicians for trying to "corner the ethnic vote," Fowler said Canada's reputation has been tarnished by Canadian governments that "have turned inward and adopted 'me-first' positions in foreign affairs."

Charging that Fowler is "wrong on the facts," Fogel said that while "both the current government and the Liberal one it succeeded undertook reviews of Canadian policy, they did so because officials had allowed it to drift away from a principled position.

"Canada should enjoy a special relationship with its only sister democracy in the region – a fact Fowler pointedly ignored. And, contrary to his assertion, the Harper government has committed some $300 million to the Palestinians – hardly a policy of a government that ignores stakeholders other than Israel.

"Finally, political parties' efforts to engage various communities does not constitute pandering. It is the essence of the democratic process. And, just because the two parties that command the support of a majority of Canadians adopt a position different than the one Fowler and his cronies would prefer does not make it any less legitimate."

Fowler, kidnapped and held for 130 days by Islamic militants when he was a United Nations' special envoy to Niger in 2008, urged Harper to accept the "iron-clad" connection between "continuing turmoil and volatility in the Middle East and the rise [and] growing strength of international terrorism."

He observed that both Liberal and Conservative politicians refuse to acknowledge that reality out of fear they will be labelled anti-Semites.

Fowler urged Canada to challenge Israel's settlement policy in "illegally occupied territories."

He said that Israel is building settlements there "in contravention of a myriad of international judgments."

Calls to the Department of Foreign Affairs for comment were not returned by The CJN's deadline.

Hoops tournament set for April 4

Compiled by CJN Staff

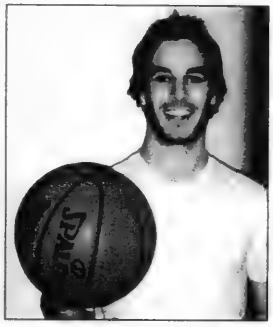
TORONTO — Hoops 4 Israel will kick off its fourth year of fundraising with its annual basketball tournament on April 4 at 10 a.m. at HoopDome in Downsview Park.

Thirty-two basketball teams will compete in the event, a charitable initiative to benefit Israeli youth.

"Hoops 4 Israel is a platform that advocates primarily for Ethiopian-Israeli at-risk youth," said tournament founder David Goodman. "However, with our growth comes more awareness of our brand. We now have an opportunity to bring awareness to other issues in our sphere, such as young adults with developmental challenges and autism, climate change awareness and sustainable living and Jewish community-building in Canada."

Held in conjunction with UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and Birthright Israel Alumni Community, the Hoops 4 Israel brand has expanded consistently, along with its roster of volunteers.

"I am thrilled to witness the overwhelming support from over 160 volunteers, past Birthright Israel participants and their desire to see the project grow and succeed," Goodman said. "When you see your peers returning year after year to volunteer, one can't help but feel optimistic about successfully sustaining the Hoops 4 Israel initiative for years to come."



David Goodman

Hoops 4 Israel generated $330,000 in charitable contributions at its first three tournaments. Since last year's event, Hoops 4 Israel increased its fundraising total to more than $400,000, thanks to donations and corporate sponsorships. It's the largest collective fundraising project among the 220,000 Birthright Israel alumni.

These donations have helped create programs and facilities that support at-risk youth in Kiryat Moshe and Bat Yam in Israel, where Hoops 4 Israel has funded an outdoor basketball court and an indoor gymnasium, as well as youth sports and cultural programs for Ethiopian immigrants having trouble adjusting to modern Israeli society.

Going beyond the actual tournament, the Hoops 4 Israel initiative has expanded with new side projects this year. The expansion includes partnering with David Lasday of Peace Players International, who works with Israeli and Palestinian children across Israel. Another new event is the Jam 4 Israel, a fundraising after-party to celebrate the success of Hoops 4 Israel and keep fundraising for the cause.

Earlier this year, the Hoops 4 Israel tournament model was taken to the campus of the University of Western Ontario, where students raised $2,500 at their own tournament. Goodman hopes to take the tournament to Montreal next year.

Stamp marks Israel, Canada relations

By LAUREN KRAMER
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — Next month Canada Post and the Israel Philatelic Service are issuing an international rate commemorative stamp to celebrate the strong bilateral relationship between the two countries.

This is the first joint issue between the Israeli and Canadian postal administrations, and it will depict the maple leaf and the Star of David in red and blue respectively, each symbol comprised of people standing side by side.

The stamp will launch in Canada and in Israel on April 14 and will be available in a booklet of six stamps. There will be 660,000 stamps issued, each one worth $1.70 in Canada and 4.60 NIS in Israel.

Jim Phillips, director of stamp services at Canada Post, said this joint issue is "a form of diplomacy between postal administrations, providing great opportunities to share with and learn from one another.

"We've done a number of stamps celebrating Canada's diplomatic relations over the years, with China, the United States, Mexico, Japan and Ireland, but this is our first with Israel," he said.

The idea for the Canada-Israel stamp was initiated in a few letters from the public to Canada Post's corporate office for stamp submission. The office receives approximately 600 suggestions for stamps each year and selects between 20 and 25.

Executives from the Israel Philatelic Society flew to Canada last year to discuss the stamp's design, and both countries arrived at the boardroom table with a few options created by design firms in their respective countries.

The design by Toronto-based q30 design was the strongest by far, Phillips said.

"They've worked with us for years, have designed the faces of many stamps and are really a go-to company for us," he added.

The stamp design was intended to communicate the "rich topic of diplomacy between two nations," according to Glenda Rissman, a principal at q30 design.

"Canada's red figures and Israel's blue figures come together to meet in the middle of the stamp, and the meeting of the human figures symbolizes and celebrates the relationship between the two nations."

The company has designed 40 stamps for Canada Post in the past, with subject matter including the 50th anniversary of the Holocaust and the Queen's 80th birthday. The mandate for the Canada-Israel stamp was to depict 60 years of diplomatic relations without showing specific people.

"Illustrator Yarek Waszul has a graphic yet conceptual style that lends itself perfectly to this topic and the medium," says Karen Henricks, a designer at q30 design. "Through illustration we were able to convey diplomacy on a very tiny stamp."

Yaron Razon, director of the IPS, said that stamps are "paper ambassadors" that spread the message of their country on letters around the world.

"What could be a more symbolic and fitting way to express 60 years of co-operation and friendship between Israel and Canada than a joint stamp issue – the merging of each country's paper ambassadors?" he asked.

במוסף צפון אמריקה של "ידיעות אחרונות" ממליץ הכתב הבכיר יניב חלילי על ההצעות הטובות בברדוזי. וכך הוא כותב:

"חמש מחוות זמר מחשבים לבסיס של כל חובב ברדוזי, אם אתם רוצים ללכת על בטוח". "מחוה" הוא בלשון זכר, למרות שאומרים "מחוות" ברבים. ואכן חלילי אומר "מחוות זמר נחשבים" מה שמדגיש שהוא יודע ש"מחוה" הוא זכר. אבל מדוע "חמש מחוות", אם "מחוה" הוא זכר, ולא "חמישה מחוות"? לחלילי פתרונים.

Hadassah leader's killer sentenced

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — The 10-year jail sentence handed down last week for the man who killed Terry Schwarzfeld a little more than a year ago was met with disappointment and resignation by her friends and family.

Schwarzfeld – a prominent member of the Ottawa Jewish community who had just been elected national president of Canadian Hadassah-WIZO and who was executive director of Ottawa's largest synagogue, Agudath Israel – was beaten to death Feb. 28, 2009, while vacationing in Barbados with her husband, son and daughter-in-law.

She and her daughter-in-law, Luana Cotsman, were attacked while walking on a beach where they had often walked before. Both were knocked unconscious after being hit with a piece of wood. Cotsman regained consciousness and made a slow recovery, but Schwarzfeld, 60, later died in an Ottawa hospital after being airlifted back to Canada.

Last week, a judge in Barbados sentenced Curtis Joel Foster, a 25-year-old with eight previous criminal convictions, to 10 years in prison, much less than the 16 to 20 years sought by the prosecution.

Terry Schwarzfeld

Originally charged with murder, Foster, who had eight prior criminal convictions, pleaded guilty in January to manslaughter. Prosecutors said they accepted the plea because they were convinced a jury would not find that he intended to kill Schwarzfeld.

In sentencing him, Justice Randall Worell dismissed reports of Foster's difficult life and reported psychiatric problems, stating that others have risen above such circumstances. He was unable to determine that the murder had been premeditated, however, and thus pronounced the longest sentence he felt the law allowed.

In a 1,600-word victim impact statement submitted to the court before sentencing, Schwarzfeld's husband, Stephen Cotsman, said on behalf of the family that "we have truly lost an amazing person — someone who was larger than life and beloved by many… That is why our grief is so deep, so cutting and why it is so very hard for all of us to get on with our lives."

The Ottawa Citizen quoted Schwarzfeld's sister, Joan Schwarzfeld, as saying that she and other family members are displeased with the sentence, but that "it doesn't change anything, really."

Debbie Baylin, a longtime friend of Schwarzfeld's who worked with her on many Hadassah-WIZO projects over the years, agreed. "Terry's death made such a hole in so many people's lives that no sentence could affect how we all feel about what we lost. They could have sentenced him to 50 years and it wouldn't have made any difference. No sentence would have seemed fair," she said.

Haddasah-WIZO national honorary vice-president Toby Yan added: "Nothing is going to bring her back. I think what they did was the best they could in terms of getting him put away for awhile. They went for manslaughter because they didn't think they could convict him of murder, and it is also over with, which is good. It has been drawn out long enough, but they did get him and they charged him and he will be in prison."

Charles Leacock, Barbados' director of public prosecutions, has filed a notice to appeal the sentence, though no date has been set for the appeal.

Spring temperatures have arrived, and it is now time to get ready for the new 2010 Spring Beauty Collection. Start this spring by treating yourself to a facial, either in a salon or do one at home. Chilled yogurt can be used as a mask to restore your skin's PH balance. For extra hydration add a teaspoon of honey. A natural look is all about flawless skin! It is important to keep the skin looking its best. Daily cleansers and moisturizers with an SPF help to protect harmful and aging effects of the skin. Make sure to use moisturizing lotions for the body as well.

Spring makeup this season is bursting with colour! Pretty pinks, lilacs and turquoise are in and hot! Black liner is replaced with dark navy and the old browns are taken over by emerald green and royal blues. Long lashes are big! You can achieve this with applying many coats of mascara or permanent false eyelashes applied individually. Eyebrows should be well groomed. Vibrant red lipsticks are classy for this spring. A bit of blush applied to the apples of the cheeks create that flushed look. Bronzer, of course, is still hot but should be applied lightly. Pink lips and red lips are making statements.

Hairstyles are asymmetrical, and we are seeing a lot of loose and one-sided buns, as well as long braids pulled over one shoulder. Long waves are still hot! Heavy bangs are strong, and ponytails are making a statement. Red hair turns heads this season. Shades of titanium orange, auburn and strawberry blond certainly stand out in the crowd.

HAIR

Continuing its dedication to issues affecting women, this year Moroccanoil will make a donation to the Breast Cancer Research Foundation, in support of life-saving research. The award-winning signature product of Moroccanoil's fabulous hair-care line has lightened up a little! Moroccanoil introduces Moroccanoil Light, boasting the same shiny, smooth, miraculous results as the original formula, but in a lighter consistency, perfect for fine and fair coloured hair.

With the variety of chemical and colour hair services offered these days, protecting your scalp is essential to prevent dryness, irritation and discomfort. To ensure your scalp is at its healthiest at all times, Moroccanoil presents Dry-No-More Professional Scalp Treatment. It fixes the root of the problem while creating an environment for fuller, healthier hair.

When it comes to scalp issues, the focus tends to be on dryness, but excessive oil production is of equal concern. Recognizing this, Moroccanoil presents Oil-No-More Scalp Treatment. Formulated with ginger oil, astringents and purifying properties, Oil-No-More works deep down to help control oil production.

Lancome Créme de Brilliance Lip Glosses

Travelling has never been more complicated than today. With strict restrictions on liquids and container sizes, packing carry-on luggage can be a real hassle. Helping you travel light, Moroccanoil introduces the new Travel Kit. The Travel Kit includes one Moroccanoil Treatment, one Moroccanoil Hydrating Styling Cream, one Moroccanoil Moisture Repair Shampoo and one Moroccanoil Moisture Repair Conditioner.

Introducing some of Kevin.Murphy's bestselling products! Born.Again Wash is an ultra-rich moisturizing shampoo for extremely tortured and chemically dehydrated hair. Be sure to try Hair.Curlers. Finally, the curlers I have always wanted but could never find. These curlers have tiny hair-like ridges that feed hair evenly onto the surface.

To keep you on trend and looking ultra chic, the LaCoupe Volume Collection introduces three new products that give boost to your locks' needs without the bust to your wallet. LaCoupe Hair Plumper leave-in volumizing cream brings fullness without weighing hair down. LaCoupe Voluptress cream gel styler puts full body, shine and hold from one container, and LaCoupe Flexible Fix finishing spray keeps hair full and in place without making your style statuesque.

Schwarzkof Professional presents a new advanced formula to their best-selling hair-care range, BC Hairtherapy. Schwarzkopf Professional has also added new products and a brand new range to the BC Hairtherapy line, called BC Hairtherapy Volume Boost.

STACEY'S TIPS

SPA AND SKIN CARE

One of the most effective ways to keep skin looking strong, healthy, and young is to keep it hydrated. Without water, skin is less able to naturally and effectively prevent and correct the premature signs of aging. The solution to premature aging caused by dehydration? Hydrationist, Estée Lauder's most powerfully hydrating crème to date. Instantly, thirsty, dehydrated skin is quenched with new and exclusive Bio-Mimetic Water to deliver immediate moisture lasting 24 hours.

Everyday facial movements from talking, frowning, squinting and laughing can all contribute to the progressive deepening of expression lines. Estée Lauder scientists have developed the most advanced, comprehensive, targeted wrinkle-filling treatment to date. Perfectionist [CP+] Targeted Deep Wrinkle Filler smooths, fills and helps reduce the look of even deepest wrinkles on contact. Perfectionist [CP+] Targeted Deep Wrinkle Filler is an all-in-one concentrated treatment that immediately reduces the look of all types of deep lines – including smile lines, deep creases across the forehead, between brows, and around the eyes and lips.

Harnessing the power of high performance and skin-caring ingredients, Estée Lauder Research brings you its most advanced and effective age-defying foundation to date. The New Resilience Lift Extreme Lifting Makeup SPF15 offers all-day continuous moisture, ultra-radiance, incredible lift and exceptional spreadability – all in a new fluid formula that is ideal for maturing skin.

The first anti-aging solution that acts by stimulating DNA repair at the cellular level, Lise Watier's Résist-Age Métamulsion Serum has, less than a year after being launched, positioned itself as the landmark in the realm of modern cosmetology. The line continues to expand and now includes a day crème and night crème. Résist-Age Youth-Extender Day Fluid and Résist-Age Reenergizing Night Crème were developed from a savvy blend of powerful ingredients unearthed from the latest findings in the cosmetological industry.

More than 80 per cent of the causes of aging skin are linked to the environment and lifestyle. Yves Rocher has created Cure Solutions, a skin-care line to counter these external factors. These include changes in seasons, polluted environments, stress, fatigue and overwork. This powerhouse skin-care line is suitable for women of all ages, because these external factors begin to act on the skin very early on.

Prevage announces a major renovation. Elizabeth Arden's bestselling anti-aging formula with acclaimed antioxidant Idebenone takes anti-aging skin care to a new level of performance and innovation with Prevage Face Advanced Anti-aging Serum, which now does even more to help prevent visible signs of aging. This new formula delivers a blend of environmental defenders and Idebenone, a highly effective environmental protectant that protects skin from environmental assaults.

Consisting of 100 per cent natural and organically grown ingredients, Heiko Ultra Protection SPF creams are the first natural product sunscreen approved in the Canadian market. These dermatologically tested products are ideal for people of any age and are safe for all skin types, offering essential protection for the whole family.

NAOT Footwear has opened a new location in Thornhill, Ont., adding to the two it already operates in the Greater Toronto Area. The new store is at 1102 Centre St.W., west of Bathurst Street.

The company has also launched a testimonial site on Facebook – The Face of NAOT – where people can comment. NAOT will reward the most original entry with a pair of shoes, on a quarterly basis.

"We know fans of our footwear are hooked from the moment they put on their first pair and realize they're the most comfortable yet stylish shoes they've ever owned," NAOT president Corinne Lissoos says. "This is their chance to share with us their testimonials and feedback."

Folowing its "footprint in the sand" concept, the NAOT design ergonomically supports the foot the same way that sand fills in spaces as you leave your footprints on the beach. The unique signature innersole footbed, made of multiple layers of ergonomically designed material, can be easily removed for cleaning, or replaced entirely to extend the life of the shoes.

The new 2010 spring line features open- and closed-toes favourites, in several styles, colours and textures.

Nivea takes luxury to a whole new level with the introduction of Nivea Crème Oil Body Washes. Choose from Diamond Beauty, Pearl and Beauty or Sensual Beauty. These luxurious body washes soothe and moisturize skin with a superior caring formula that lathers into a velvety creamy foam.

Nivea For Men's new Active 3 Shower, Shampoo & Shave offers the convenient and unique three in one combination. The versatility of Nivea For Men Active 3 is based on the formula that perfectly fulfils three purposes at the same time: gently cleanses the skin, mildly and effectively shampoos the hair, and creates the ideal foam texture for a smooth shave for the entire body.

The Lancôme laboratories have shed new light on events leading to the appearance of cellulite: the unsightly appearance of dimpled skin is caused not only by fat storage within adipocyte cells, but also the multiplication of these cells, followed by their migration to the skin's surface. The Slimissime 360° complex has been developed to act at each stage of this spiral in order to combat the appearance of existing cellulite and minimize its recurrence.

This season, temperatures are rising and so are SPF levels, as awareness of the sun's harmful effects becomes a hot topic of conversation. How much SPF is enough, and how does a high SPF level protect better over a lower number? After a hugely successful launch last spring of the acclaimed 70 SPF Cream, dermaglow has introduced 70 SPF Body Mist and helps to explain why these high-protection products are vital in today's climate. Lightweight in texture, dermaglow 70 SPF Body Mist is readily absorbed and has a sheer, non-greasy feel unlike competitive high SPF products.

FRANCINE'S TIPS

CONCEALER, FOUNDATION AND BRONZERS

Before you begin to conceal, make sure to moisturize your face and the under-eye area. Finding the perfect shade of concealer is not easy. Try mixing two shades together, one that is a half of a shade lighter and one that is a shade darker. The lighter shade should be used to hide any flaws and to highlight areas such as the bridge of the nose and chin. The darker shade should be used to conceal blemishes and dark circles. Thick concealers are great for covering pimples but should not be used for the under-eye area. Concealer for dark circles should be light and hydrating.

Elizabeth Arden presents New Ceramide Skin Smoothing Concealer, a product that goes beyond hiding dark circles and minimizing the appearance of fine lines to smooth, help firm and tone the look of delicate under-eye skin for a brighter and younger look. It contains vitamins A, C and E.

Spring is the best time to change your foundation colour. Your skin has different needs depending on the temperature and foundation helps you achieve it. Try and test foundation before you purchase it, as the colour in the bottle may not match the colour of your skin. Foundation should always look natural, so make sure to blend it well into the neckline.

MAC introduces Mineralize Foundation SPF15, a luxurious solid cream compact with liquid mineral infusion. This uniquely textured foundation delivers ultimate hydration while revitalizing the look of dull and dry areas.

Don't hide your complexion; enhance it with Revlon ColorStay Mineral Finishing Powder. This powder provides a soft all-over lift of colour that diffuses flaws and minimizes shine. It can be worn alone or applied after ColorStay Mineral Foundation, ColorStay Mineral Mousse Makeup or ColorStay Makeup. It's long wearing, for up to 16 hours.

Lancôme presents Oscillation PowerFoundation, the first micro-vibrating mineral foundation for pixel precise complexion. It leaves the skin looking luminous and feeling comfortable. With an SPF 21, it has a lasting power of more than 14 hours.

Nothing is more seductive then the look of sun-kissed skin. Nothing feels more natural than pure, microlight minerals. Elizabeth Arden brings you Pure Finish Mineral Bronzing Powder in Medium. Like Pure Finish Mineral Makeup SPF20, it contains minerals, mica, seawater complex, aloe and vitamins A, C and E.

EYE MAKEUP AND BLUSH

Eye shadows this spring are bold, flashy and are making a statement on the runway, but don't get intimidated – there is a wide range of colours and a variety of shadow textures for all.

Aaron De Mey creates Ô My Rose especially for Lancôme. From sensual coral to deep aqua green, a breath of fresh air enlivens Lancôme's latest makeup collection. Pop'N'Palette is an intense eye-colour quartet available in two colours, petroleum shades to create dark green smoky eyes and a copper quartet to make eyes truly sparkle.

The Estée Lauder Michael Kors Very Hollywood Color Collection features two modern-classic looks: Bel Air Beige – beige and coral palette made up of a smoky eye – and Rodeo Pink – new shades of vibrant raspberry tones of bright and defined eyes. Eye Pencils are available in Sepia and Film Noir.

Pick a mood, decide on a demeanour and then mix it up for an authentic emotional Spring Colour Forecast by MAC. Featured in four parts on four displays, each collection has a full range of shadows, lipsticks, lip gloss, blush, nail lacquers and mascaras.

Clarins Fragrance Group is proud to introduce the Blue Collection – Regard Stellaire – Blue Rhapsody by Thierry Mugler. This palette look allows flexible effects and infinite possibilities. There are various shades of blue available in cream and airy powder textures with a matte, satiny or iridescent finish, as well as Eye Sculpt- Eye Liner, an innovative formula that shapes and defines the eye hook.

Available in limited-edition format, Lise Watier introduces Eye Duo Vintage Moderne Eyeshadows. Each practical jewel compact contains a duet chosen for retro-chic appeal. For the eye-defined look, try Lise Watier Métal Liner Bronze Limited Edition. Enriched with coppery micro-glitter, Métal Liner adds drama to every eye colour.

Lancôme now creates Hypnôse Drama, mascara that provides instant lash volume, and mesmerizing hypnotic eyes. The wand's shapely curve along with the mascara's lash-coating formula ensures that each and every lash – even the shortest lashes – becomes magnified.

For that healthy dewy finish, Elizabeth Arden introduces Ceramide Cream Blush, a cream that glides and blends evenly, bringing a natural-looking glow to your cheeks. It's long lasting and available in three shades, nectar, pink and plum.

Sunny weather makes us want to put our freshest face forward! Lise Watier Vintage Moderne Illuminating Face Powder Limited Edition is the best friend a girl could have to refresh a dull complexion. It gives skin a subtle golden-beige glow.

LIPS AND NAILS

Your lips may have taken a beating during the cold temperatures. Prime and treat your lips with Elizabeth Arden's new Advanced Lip-Fix Cream. Worn alone or as a perfect primer for lipstick, this formula seals in moisture to help soften and replenish dry lips.

Lancôme recently launched L'Absolu Crème de Brillance, the first infinite care cream gloss that is available in a range of sensual colours.

The Estée Lauder Michael Kors Very Hollywood Lip Sheen SPF15 and Lip Gloss in Hollywood Gold add the perfect finishing touch to your pout. This gloss can be worn alone or over the Lip Sheen SPF 15 for more luminous lips.

Now that your entire face looks amazing, what about your nails? Treat yourself to a manicure and pedicure – the colours are amazing and your hands and toes are more visible then ever. Nicole by OPI offers 14 exclusive new shades for spring at Walmart stores. The Nicole Walmart Nail Lacquer shades are bold, vibrant and perfect for accessorizing all the hottest new spring looks.

FRAGRANCE

Discover the fragrance you love with a refreshing new twist. Pretty eau de cologne splash by Elizabeth Arden Limited Edition offers the fresh, spirited bouquet of this season. It's the perfect way to celebrate the bright, lively, mood for spring.

The New Limited Edition Pure White Linen Eau de Toilette by Estée Lauder carries on that tradition of taking us to a perfect, sunny spring day. This fragrance was created for those who love Pure White Linen but prefer a lighter, softer scent.

Eat healthy, head to the gym and take a walk, and enjoy the prettiest time of year. Dress up and put your best face forward!

Blue Mountain spa offers visitors year-round pampering

Spa Life
By KATHRYN KATES

A getaway to Blue Mountain in Collingwood, Ont., isn't just about a winter ski trip – the Westin Trillium House Blue Mountain and the Scandinave Spa Blue Mountain have teamed up to offer visitors an all-year-round pampering and luxurious destination experience.

Mylisa Henderson, director of marketing and sales and co-owner of Scandinave Spa Blue Mountain, says the spa has had more than 135,000 visitors since opening in December of 2006.

Scandinave Spa Blue Mountain offers a true wellness experience, including hot baths, cold plunge pools, sauna, and eucalyptus steam room and relaxation areas. Henderson says it is truly rewarding to your body if you go through the sequence, which includes warming up your body for 10 minutes in the baths, sauna or steam room, cooling your body with a cold-water plunge, and then going into one of the relaxation rooms. You can repeat the experience all day and into the evening. The wellness benefits include improving your circulation.

"We have a staff of about 25 – operations and guest service agents, and an inventory of about 45 registered massage therapists," says Henderson. "We see ourselves as a nature spa, so our decorum here is very rustic, yet contemporary. We have used a lot of the Scandinavian red colour with deep browns and greys. The 13 treatment rooms are off-white with rustic wood panelling on the walls.

"We offer our guests Swedish massage as well as hot stone therapy. If you have an extended health plan, you can get a receipt for your service here. For massage, they use non-allergenic oils. We retail Akassa, an Alberta-based body product line."

The spa caters to those 19 years of age and over, most of the guests being from 40 to 60. Its clientele is about 65 per cent women – girls' getaways have proven popular. As well, the spa is often visited by couples for a romantic retreat. Forty per cent of its guests are day trippers living within a two-hour drive. Sixty per cent of Scandinave Spa's clientele spend the night at the Blue Mountain resort area.

"We have a great package with the Westin Trillium House, where you stay overnight and then come over to the Scandinave and enjoy the Scandinavian bath experience and lunch. Guests can upgrade their package to include a massage treatment as well," says Henderson.

Henderson wants visitors to Scandinave to walk across the spa's bridge and escape for the day into an environment that is completely different than any other spa experience in Ontario because it is a retreat back to nature. She says that the outdoor experience – whether it's snowing, rainy or sunny doesn't really matter – is always an escape from everyday life. The spa would like guests to embrace nature and the idea of calming the mind and relaxing the body, and yet feeling rejuvenated when they leave.

The Westin Trillium House, at the base of Blue Mountain, is the perfect spot to continue the benefits of relaxation after a day at Scandinave. The folks at trendy Oliver & Bonacini Café Grill, located in the Westin Trillium House, say they can always tell when a diner has just been to the Scandinave Spa, because they look so very relaxed, which makes for a leisurely dining experience.

All 220 spacious, contemporary guest suites boast the famous Westin Heavenly beds – and they are out of this world. Many of the suites have great views of the mountain and/or the bustling Village at Blue, chock-full of restaurants and stores.

The resort offers the Westin Kids Club Discovery for younger guests, which comes in handy when mom and dad want to visit Scandinave. There is a business centre, fitness area, a family Plunge Aquatic Centre and underground valet parking – which makes life easier if you are hauling ski equipment or golf clubs. Recreation in and around the Westin Trillium House includes skiing, golfing nearby, hiking and swimming.

To book your Scandinave Spa Blue Mountain/Westin Trillium House Blue Mountain package, call 705-443-8080, or 866-837-4192, or visit westin.com/bluemountain. For more information about Scandinave Spa Blue Mountain, call 705-443-8484 or 877-988-8484, or visit www.scandinaveblue.com.

Stubborn, determined and walking again

By ADRIANNE FITCH
Special to The CJN

VANCOUVER — Phil Switzer, a Vancouver radiologist who sees cancer on a daily basis, often has the difficult role of breaking bad news to patients. One wintry afternoon last year, he found himself in a new role. The mass on the MRI screen was his own – a tumour in his spinal cord.

Given the dangerous location of the tumour and difficulty of removal, Switzer faced the possibility of being paralyzed from the waist down. But months later, he was back on his feet again, seeing patients and resuming his favourite activities of bicycling, skiing and golf.

The story of Switzer's surgery, rehabilitation and recovery can give hope to spinalcord-injury patients worldwide. It speaks to the strength of the human spirit, the value of support and the unique perspective of the doctor as patient. It also testifies to the incredible strides made in spinal cord research.

On April 25, precisely two years after his surgery, Switzer will be honoured at Canadian Friends of Hebrew University's annual fundraising gala in support of spinal cord research, at the Vancouver Convention Centre. Co-sponsored by CFHU, the University of British Columbia and the Rick Hanson Foundation, the dinner will be hosted by Prof. Menahem Ben Sasson, president of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, Prof. Stephen Toope, president of UBC, and Rick Hanson, a paraplegic athlete and an activist for people with spinal cord injuries.

Switzer said a gradual drop in his athletic performance was his first indication that something was wrong. However, he just assumed he was getting old. "I don't pay much attention to my own symptoms, which is typical for doctors."

More symptoms appeared, such as numbness in his abdomen and a need to urinate frequently. Blaming the bladder issues on his prostate, Switzer scheduled himself for prostate surgery. He also scheduled an MRI on his knee.

Things came to a head two weeks before the planned surgery. During a ski weekend in Whistler, Switzer discussed his symptoms with his friend Barry Tessler, a neurologist. Tessler concluded the problems were neurological, and much more serious than an enlarged prostate or poor co-ordination.

The MRI, changed to examine Switzer's spine instead of his knee, revealed a tumour in the centre of his spinal cord.

"I thought I may not walk again when I saw that tumour," said Switzer. "Because of its location, any wrong movement with the surgery could cause permanent severe damage." Before surgery, he went to the gym to get in the best shape possible.

"Can I move my legs?" were Switzer's first words to his wife after the seven-hour procedure. "I had limited movement but could not feel anything from the waist down," Switzer said. "The surgeon told me it would take two years to know what return of function I would have."

Switzer is quick to acknowledge the support of his family. His wife, Diane, was constantly by his side and his children, who live outside of the province, made two trips each to assist in their father's recovery.

"I was much more aggressive for my own rehabilitation than most patients," he said. "The doctors felt I was a difficult patient, trying too hard, pushing the system."

Switzer's determination paid off, as he progressed from wheelchair, to walker, to elbow crutches, to two canes, and finally to one cane. After seven weeks, he was able to walk out of GF Strong Rehabilitation Centre unassisted.

Switzer continued pushing himself at home, working with a physiotherapist and eventually a personal trainer. His daily walks were so vital to him that neither rain, darkness nor his own appearance could discourage him.

Though mostly back to normal physically, Switzer still has limited sensation from the waist down. Due to impaired bladder function, he makes sure to stay close to a bathroom – or bushes – at all times.

On a professional level Switzer, who performs about seven breast biopsies a day, feels more empathy toward his patients. "Before doing a biopsy, I always tried to hold the patient's hand, and I do that even more now. I think it's really important not only to do the procedure but to make the patient feel she is human and not just a specimen."

Occasionally, Switzer tells his patients about the tumour in his spine, and advises them to take things one day at a time.

"There's nothing you can do about the situation you're in. What you can control is how you deal with yourself on an emotional and spiritual level. If you don't have the right emotional attitude, you can not do the physical."

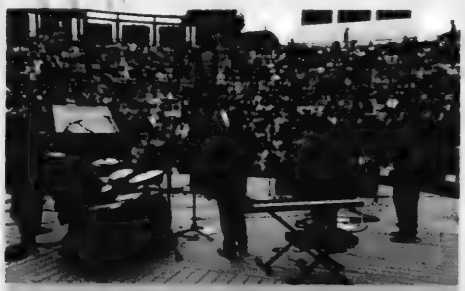
Ester Klimitz aims to bring Yiddish to young Jews



The UJA Federation Committee for Yiddish holds various events, including an annual concert, to promote Yiddish culture.

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Ester Klimitz always loved Yiddish. As a child, it was her link to her parent's past. As a teenager, it was a comfort in a foreign world. And now, at 29 years old, it's a way for Klimitz, the co-ordinator of the UJA Federation Committee for Yiddish, to keep a culture alive.

"It's our ancestors' language. I consider myself very lucky that I speak Hebrew and Yiddish," said Klimitz, who became the co-ordinator of the committee about half a year ago.

"It's not common these days for a younger person to speak and understand [Yiddish]. I'm not delusional. Eventually [the language] won't be around at all... but the culture, and everything Yiddish has given us outside the language, will never die."

Klimitz originally learned Yiddish from her grandmother and parents, who were from Russia and Lithuania.

She started learning the language formally at Bialik Hebrew Day School in Grade 8, when she immigrated to Canada from Israel. In high school, she attended the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, where Yiddish wasn't offered. Undeterred, Klimitz, along with two other students, found a night course through the Toronto District School Board.

"It was difficult to go [after school] from 6 p.m. to 9 p.m. There was homework and what not," she said, adding that it was worth the effort

For Klimitz, both Hebrew and Yiddish were more than just languages. They were comforts – something familiar in a strange new society.

"A big part of going to Bialik was the real sadness that came over me when the realization came that I wasn't living in Israel. I was ripped apart from my school, my friends, and moved to a country that was extremely different," she said. "I clung to what was familiar to me. Bialik was the beginning of that. Hebrew was something I knew, I understood... it felt good to be around Jewish kids that understood Hebrew."

But learning Yiddish was about clinging to her past, said Klimitz.

"With Yiddish, I really love the language. We call Yiddish mamaloshen, your mother tongue... It's just a part of my history, of my culture," she said, adding that she taught Yiddish through the Toronto District School Board when she was 16.

"The culture is part of what makes us connected [to other] Jews. If you were Jewish in a shtetl in Ukraine and you, for some reason, had to leave, if you spoke Yiddish, [Jewish communities] immediately knew everything about you."

After Klimitz finished high school, she attended the University of Toronto, where she earned a minor in Jewish studies. At the university, Klimitz took as many Yiddish courses as she could.

"I really enjoyed... reading stories in Yiddish... They teach you so much about Jewish humour," she said, adding that she also learned about the Jewish culture in the Holocaust through her Yiddish-language courses.

For her thesis in one of her classes, Klimitz interviewed an elderly couple who had survived the Holocaust.

"Honestly, they started crying. They talked about how [Yiddish] kept them close to each other and the other people they were with," she said. "To the older generation, [Yiddish] was a way of life. Unfortunately, those generations are passing away."

Through her Yiddish studies and personal experiences, Klimitz realized that the language meant different things to different generations.

"For [the older generation] the connection was their home back in Europe. To the younger generation, if we teach them about it accordingly, [they'll] learn about the connection of the language to all the other aspects of Judaism," she said.

When interviewing for the position of co-ordinator of the committee, Klimitz was worried her Yiddish wouldn't be up to par. She quickly learned that she was wrong.

"When I was interviewed for the job, I was brushing up on Yiddish. I walked in and started speaking and they go, 'We don't understand, we don't' speak Yiddish,'" she said. "There are a few members of the committee who aren't as fluent as I am in Yiddish, they're just passionate about [Yiddish] culture and art."

The committee is a centre point for Yiddish activities in Toronto's Jewish community. Members organize conversation classes, reading circles, an annual summer concert and Sunday morning children's classes. While it has tried in the past, the organization has a hard time involving youth in many of their events. Klimitz is working to change this.

"It's a difficult thing to do. The committee doesn't have young people on it. I found it a very difficult thing to accomplish," she said of youth programming, adding that most Yiddish committee members are over 50. "It seems like they've given up because they've tried for so long and it hasn't worked."

Through her position on the committee, Klimitz is determined to connect younger Jews with the Yiddish language, as well as its stories, theatre, music and culture.

"I've just come on and that's one of my goals, to try something different from a younger point of view," she said, adding that this involves Yiddish events that are mostly in English to slowly integrate youths into the culture.

According to Klimitz, many parents don't teach their children Yiddish because they feel that Hebrew is a more relevant language and that kids can't learn more than two languages.

Klimitz disagrees. Her daughter, who's three, already knows Hebrew and Yiddish.

"Kids are just sponges," she said. "My daughter can learn seven languages at a time if she wanted to."

If your organization or synagogue is planning an event related to Yiddish, the Yiddish committee can be contacted at eklimitz@ujafed.org.

Breakfast and lunch ideas

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

Where is it written that Pesach breakfasts have to be boring? I'm all for keeping all non-seder foods simple, but I just won't start my day with anything less than a great meal. In my house, during chol hamoed, that, more often than not, means pancakes.

The following recipes capture the spirit of an everyday breakfast while adhering to the rules of Pesach.

PESACH SWEET CHEESE PANCAKES

1/2 lb. cottage cheese
2 cups matzah meal
1/2 cup sugar
3 eggs
2 cups milk
1 tsp.vanilla extract
sliced strawberries

In a bowl, combine all the ingredients except the strawberries and whisk to combine. The batter will be kind of thick. Drop by spoonfuls on a hot griddle, press down so that pancake can brown well. Turn to brown other side. Serve with sliced berries or syrup or both. Serves 6 to 8.

PEACHY PESACH PANCAKES

2 cups pancake mix
1 egg
1 1/2 cups milk
2 tbsp. packed brown sugar
1/2 tsp. ground cinnamon
1 (29 oz.) can sliced peaches, drained very well and chopped (3/4 cup set aside)
3/4 cup whipping (heavy) cream, whipped

In bowl of an electric mixer, beat the whipped cream to medium peaks. Add all of the chopped peaches except the 3/4 cup set aside. Gently fold peaches in by hand and then refrigerate.

In a bowl, combine the pancake mix, egg, milk, brown sugar, 3/4 cup chopped peaches and cinnamon. Beat to combine. Grease a griddle or frying pan, and for each pancake, pour a scant 1/4 cupful onto the hot surface (add additional grease while cooking if necessary). Cook until pancakes are dry around edges. Turn; cook until golden brown. Serve immediately with the peachy whipped cream.

BUTTERMILK BLUEBERRY PESACH PANCAKES

4 eggs separated
6 tbsp. oil
1 cup buttermilk
1/2 cup sugar
2/3 cup matzah meal
1/4 cup potato starch
3/4 to 1 cup blueberries
3 to 5 tbsp.butter or margarine

In the bowl of an electric mixer, beat the egg whites until soft peaks form. Gradually add the sugar and continue beating until you get stiff peaks. Take out 2/3 of the egg whites, and then beat the remaining1/3 of the egg whites with the oil for about 3 minutes. Add the milk to the egg white and oil and beat for another minute. Gradually add the matzah meal and potato starch – don't worry, the batter is supposed to be thick. By hand, fold in the remaining egg whites. Fold in the blueberries.

Heat a griddle or frying pan and melt the butter in pan. Pour a scant 1/4 cup per pancake onto the griddle. Cook until dry around the edges, Turn and cook until golden, 3 to 4 minutes. Makes 8 to 10 pancakes.

PARMESAN ZUCCHINI PANCAKES

4 to 5 small to medium size zucchini, grated
1 small red onion, minced
1 egg, beaten
2/3 cup matzah meal
1 tbsp. fresh oregano, chopped, or 1 tsp. dried salt and pepper to taste
3 tbsp. olive oil
1/4 cup Parmesan cheese

In a bowl, combine the grated zucchini and onion together in a small bowl. Beat in the egg, matzah meal oregano, salt, pepper and Parmesan cheese. Heat the oil in a large heavy skillet. Drop mixture by tablespoonfuls into the skillet, pressing down with the back of a spoon to flatten the pancakes. Fry the cake, turning once, until crisp and dark golden brown, about 2 to 3 minutes per side.

TOMATO FRITTATA

3 tbsp. olive oil or butter
1 large onion, chopped
1 zucchini, halved, sliced
1 yellow crookneck squash, sliced
2 tsp.minced garlic
8 eggs
3/4 tsp. oregano
1/2 tsp. dill
1/2 tsp. salt
1/4 tsp. freshly ground pepper
1/2 cup Parmesan or feta cheese
1 tomato, seeded and diced additional cheese for topping

Heat oil in a large skillet. Add the onion and cook 4 to 5 minutes. Add zucchini, squash and garlic; cook 5 minutes or until zucchini and squash are soft but not mushy.

Set aside the vegetables but leave them in the skillet. In a bowl, whisk together the eggs, oregano, dill, salt and pepper. Return the vegetable mixture to the heat and cook for 1 minute at high. Reduce the heat to low and add the egg mixture to the squash mixture in the pan. Do not stir. Sprinkle the cheese on top.

Cover the pan and cook 5 minutes. Uncover the pan and push the egg mixture away from sides of pan with a rubber spatula. Occasionally tip pan and allow the uncooked egg mixture to run to the sides and bottom of pan.

Add a little more butter or oil if you think it's sticking. Top the frittata with the chopped tomato and additional cheese if you like your frittata cheesy and then continue to cook it covered, 5 to 7 minutes or until set, occasionally pushing and tipping eggs. Slide the cooked frittata onto the serving plate and serve immediately. Serves 6.

Israel worries over possible row with EU

By BARAK RAVID and ANSHEL PFEFFER
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Inc.

JERUSALEM — Israeli government sources say it's likely that after the current diplomatic crisis and the pressure applied by the United States regarding the Palestinian issue, Israel will soon face an even more serious row with the European Union.

A government source in Jerusalem said this was the concern voiced during a conference call between Foreign Ministry Director General Yossi Gal and seven of Israel's ambassadors in major world capitals.

Gal spoke last Thursday with Israel's ambassador to the United States, Michael Oren, and the envoys to the European Union, London, Rome, the United Nations, Moscow and Paris.

The envoys all said that if U.S. pressure continued, the European Union would go even further in condemning Israel and promoting diplomatic initiatives.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu told the cabinet Sunday that he saw "no signs of moderation" among the Palestinians. "However, we will maintain a restrained framework of debate and continue our talks with the U.S. administration to move the process of dialogue forward," he said.

Netanyahu said the statements reported in Yedioth Ahronoth that an anonymous associate had called Obama "a disaster for Israel" were "improper," adding that "we are trying to move the peace process ahead but also to serve our interests, and we continue to narrow the gaps with the administration."

In a first extensive statement by a senior minister on the diplomatic dispute with the United States, Defence Minister Ehud Barak said continued co-operation with America was necessary to protect Israel's security.

He added, however, that "only we have the exclusive responsibility when it comes to the fate and security of Israel, and only we can determine the matters pertaining to the fate of Israel and the Jewish people. But we must never lose sight of how important these relations are, or the ability to act in harmony and unity with the United States."

Barak termed the recent diplomatic crisis "a disagreement among friends," and emphasized that it is "crucial to remember that the United States is friendly to Israel in a deep and substantial way."

He added that "the components of the agreement [with the Palestinians] are clear. I believe it is our obligation to seek an agreement that sets a clear border within the Land of Israel based on security and demographic considerations, with the Jewish state, the State of Israel, on one side with a solid majority of Jews through the generations, and the demilitarized Palestinian state on the other side with territorial, economic and political viability."

In related developments, on Monday, Barak warned Hamas that Israel would react harshly to any escalation along its border with the Gaza Strip.

"The enemy in the Gaza Strip has paid and will continue to pay a heavy price if it tries to shake the equilibrium along the border," Barak said.

His comments came as he visited troops from the Israel Defence Forces' Golani Brigade who took part in an exchange of fire that killed two of their comrades at the border this weekend.

Netanyahu issued his own warning on Sunday, saying Israel would retaliate against any attack on its citizens or soldiers and Hamas would be held accountable for its actions.

The two deaths in Gaza clashes on Friday have increased concern in the IDF that Hamas is trying to alter the situation along the Gaza Strip border fence, possibly by targeting Israeli patrols.

"Israel's policy of retaliation is forceful and decisive," Netanyahu said during the weekly government meeting in Jerusalem, asserting that Israel would "retaliate decisively against any attack on our citizens and soldiers.

"This policy is well-known and will continue. Hamas and the other terror organizations need to know that they are the ones that are responsible for their own actions," Netanyahu said.

UN human rights body distributes 'blood libel'

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The UN Human Rights Council (UNHRC) is being accused of circulating a crude anti-Semitic document reminiscent of medieval blood libels without exercising its discretion to modify it.

During the 13th session of the council, which ended last week, the UN body distributed a document to delegates that had been submitted by EAFORD, the International Organization for the Elimination of all Forms of Racial Discrimination. The document now bears "the UN imprimatur" and was published as a UN document, said Hillel Neuer, executive director of UN Watch.

Hillel Neuer

EAFORD accuses Israel of "ethnic cleansing and massacres" and alleges that "Israeli physicians, medical centres, rabbis and the Israeli army" harvested the organs of "dead, kidnapped and killed Palestinians."

"After Israeli physicians remove organs they think marketable, the soldiers bury the bodies in graves that carry only numbers and no names, or place them in sealed caskets and deliver them under curfew conditions to the families and supervise the digging of the graves and burial," EAFORD stated.

The Swiss-based organization urged the UNHRC to investigate the allegations, which first appeared in a Swedish newspaper. The freelance journalist, Donald Bostrom, subsequently acknowledged he was repeating rumours and could not substantiate the claims.

Neuer said the UNHRC has in the past called on him to modify the language used in written statements and oral submissions, and it should have done no less with the material from EAFORD.

"We submitted six or seven written statements for this session but the UN called us with regard to calling Sudan, Burma, Sri Lanka, Pakistan and Zimbabwe 'regimes.' They didn't like the language and they asked us to change it" to governments, he said.

"I couldn't use the word 'regime,' but they use the most fantastic medieval blood libels," Neuer added.

Neuer pointed out that in addressing the council on agenda item seven, "Palestine," UN Watch was reprimanded by council president Alex Van Meeuwen for saying the Goldstone report adopted "the narrative of a terrorist group," referring to Hamas.

Van Meeuwen said he had called for "dignity and respect in this chamber" and said UN Watch's remarks "cannot be accepted."

"Tolerance and respect should be the key words of the council's work," he added.

Neuer accused the council of a double standard. "When they want to, they call to get a change on written documents that are circulated," he said.

Canadian Jewish Congress CEO Bernie Farber said the UN document circulated "blood libels" similar to one accusing Jews of using human blood in rituals.

"Not only is there no proof, it is a take-off of the historical calumny of the Jewish blood libel, and that this is coming out under the auspices of the United Nations, and from an accredited UN organization, is breathtaking in its shame," he said.

B'nai Brith Canada condemned the Human Rights Council for publishing EAFORD's claims. EAFORD, B'nai Brith noted, was funded by Libya.

"A modern-day blood libel against the Jewish people is sadly now part of the UN's international record," said Frank Dimant, B'nai Brith's executive vice-president.

David Matas, B'nai Brith's senior legal counsel who monitored the Human Rights Council in Geneva, said "We call on the UN to start its much-needed reform by denouncing and rescinding EAFORD's blood libel against Israel and cleansing its Human Rights Council of regimes whose sole purpose to sit on that entity is to shield themselves from the human rights microscope, while at the same time seeking to demonize Israel. The UN must reform or it will cease to exist as a legitimate organization capable of defending the freedoms and human rights that all people of good faith hold dear."

Circulation of the EAFORD statement came as the council adopted five resolutions critical of Israel. Only three resolutions were directed at the rest of the world, targeting North Korea, Myanmar (Burma) and Guinea.

The resolutions against Israel "all turn a blind eye to Hamas and Hezbollah terrorism," Neuer said.

"It is a continuation of the pattern and practice of hypocrisy and injustice and moral inversion. We were promised reform, and instead we're seeing regression," he said.

One of the resolutions adopted by the council was a follow-up to the Goldstone report on last year's war in Gaza, which called on Israel and Palestinians to investigate allegations of violations of human rights law. It also urged establishment of an escrow fund for reparations to Palestinians who suffered loss during the Gaza conflict of December 2008 and January 2009. No such fund is proposed for Israeli victims of Palestinian attacks.

Efforts to reach the UNHRC for comment were unsuccessful.

Obama aide calms diplomatic waters

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — A top aide to the U.S. leader said on Sunday that Barack Obama did not give Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu the cold shoulder when the two met in the White House last week.

Obama hosted Netanyahu for official talks on March 23 but did not dine with his visitor and, by keeping the talks closed to the media, also denied Netanyahu the courtesy of a photo-opportunity with him.

This raised questions in blogs and at White House news briefings that it was a deliberately calibrated gesture by the administration to communicate its displeasure with Netanyahu over Israeli housing construction in east Jerusalem, which have stalled peace negotiations with the Palestinians in the form of U.S-mediated indirect talks.

"This was a working meeting among friends. And so there was no snub intended," White House senior adviser David Axelrod told CNN's State of the Union news program.

Axelrod noted that the two leaders had met in private for two hours and had better things to do with their time than worry about protocol.

Secretary of State Hillary Clinton said prior to the leaders' meeting that Israeli construction in east Jerusalem and the disputed West Bank undermines mutual trust.

Axelrod told CNN on Sunday: "This was not about formalities. This was not about a ceremonial meeting. This was a working meeting. We have a deep, abiding interest in Israel's security. And we believe the peace process is essential to that. And we are doing everything we can to move that process forward."

Netanyahu on Sunday also rejected a description of U.S. President Barack Obama as a "disaster" for Israel, a phrase the Yediot Achronot newspaper attributed to an anonymous confidant of the premier.

Besides defending Obama, Netanyahu tried to play down tension with Washington over Israeli settlement policy, telling his cabinet that Israel and the United States were "allies and friends."

A statement issued by Netanyahu's office said: "The prime minister emphatically rejects the anonymous quotes about President Obama that a newspaper attributed to one of his confidants, and he condemns them."

To his cabinet, Netanyahu said: "I want to say clearly, these comments are unacceptable to me. They do not come from anyone representing me," he told his cabinet in public remarks.

"The relations between Israel and the United States are those of allies and friends, and are based on tradition spanning many years," he said.

Meanwhile, Axelrod told CNN on Sunday that the United States was making progress in its efforts to find allies to hold the line on Iran's nuclear ambitions.

Axelrod said that at the start of the Obama administration, Iran was united while the world was divided on how best to deal with Iran.

The situation is now reversed, he said, as the world is coming together while Iran itself is divided.

Axelrod added that he was pleased with the co-operation that the Russians have offered and believes Moscow would support fresh penalties against Tehran.

Russian President Dmitry Medvedev said Saturday that punishing Iran even more because of its nuclear program is not the best option, but that step can't be excluded.

Building talks frozen

All discussions over new construction in Jerusalem have been frozen, according to reports. Meetings of the interior ministry's regional planning and building committee have been postponed until a management committee to co-ordinate among government ministries on the construction has been established, the Interior Ministry said in a statement. The statement followed the approval March 23 of 20 new Jewish homes on the site of the Shepherd Hotel in east Jerusalem. The approval came just hours before Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu met with U.S. President Barack Obama at the White House. The Shepherd Hotel, located in the Sheikh Jarrah neighbourhood, was purchased in 1985 by Irving Moskowitz, a Jewish-American billionaire, for $1 million (US). In a March 24 statement, the Jerusalem Municipality noted that the plan for the site was approved in July 2009, at which time it received a great deal of media attention. The approval, however, was contingent on the payment of certain fees, which were paid on March 15, at which time the local planning councils approval became final. Construction can begin immediately.

Israeli wines win

Seven Israeli wines were recognized in the Bacchus International Wine Competition in Madrid. The ninth edition of the prestigious competition, organized by the Spanish Tasting Union, was held March 12-16 at the Casino de Madrid and attracted more than 80 wine-tasting experts from around the world. Seven Israeli wineries competed with veteran participants from Australia, Chile, France, Italy and Germany, and with others from emerging winemaking countries such as Canada and Brazil. The Israeli brands won four Gold Bacchus awards and three Silver Bacchus awards.

Peres meets Iranian dissident

Israeli President Shimon Peres met with the fiancé of the late Neda Soltan, whose brutal murder during the 2009 Iranian election protests became a symbol for the opposition. "I came to Israel as an ambassador of the Iranian people, as a messenger from the camp of peace," Caspian Makin told Peres during their meeting Monday. Makin had requested the meeting, Peres' office said. "Neda was a progressive person, a freedom fighter, and these traits flowed through her veins. She loved people with every small inch of her soul. Before her murder we spoke a lot about her goals, and we both knew the danger," Makin told Peres. Soltan's killing by Iranian soldiers attempting to quell a protest was caught on video and seen on the Internet and TV around the world. "You can murder a person, but not a spirit," Peres told Makin. "I am glad you gave me the opportunity to express my condolences for your great tragedy, and also mention my great hope for the future."

Clashes at Gaza fence

Israel Defence Forces soldiers shot and killed two Palestinians near the Gaza security fence as they tried to place an explosive device near the border, Palestinian news agencies reported last Friday. The reports said heavy crossfire took place between soldiers and Palestinians near the Kissufim crossing east of Khan Yunis, during which the Palestinians were killed. Earlier in the week, an Israeli soldier was killed by friendly fire on the Gaza border after the IDF received a report of three Palestinians who had crossed the border fence.

Britain expels Israeli diplomat over 'passport misuse'

By DANNA HARMAN

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman said Israel "regretted" Britain's decision last Tuesday to expel an Israeli diplomat over the alleged use of forged British passports by suspected killers of a Hamas commander in Dubai.

"We attribute great importance to our relations with Britain," Lieberman said in a statement from Brussels, where he was meeting with senior European Union officials.

"We hold a number of different and sensitive dialogues with them, and regret the British decision. We have never been given proof that Israel was involved in this affair."

Officials in Jerusalem expressed disappointment with Britain's public response to the matter, with some saying off the record that they saw it as a negative step in the war on terror.

Britain accuses Israel of being involved in the assassination of Hamas arms dealer Mahmoud al-Mabhouh in Dubai in January.

British Foreign Secretary David Miliband went before parliament to announce that the five-week investigation by the Serious and Organized Crime Squad into the use of 12 forged British passports had concluded with the finger pointed squarely at Israel. There would be immediate and serious repercussions, he said.

According to several sources, the expelled member was the unassuming head of the Mossad agency in London, who was given two weeks to pack up, take his children out of school, and leave the country.

Fallout from the affair also continued as the British Foreign Office issued a travel advisory to citizens traveling to Israel and the Palestinian territories last Tuesday.

Citing "circumstantial evidence of Israeli involvement in the fraudulent use of British passports," the foreign office warned on its website of the "possibility that your passport details could be captured for improper uses while your passport is out of your control."

Even before Britain's decision to expel the Israeli diplomat, last Tuesday was meant to be an historic occasion in British-Israeli ambassadorial circles as the newly refurbished Israeli Embassy in London was opened.

"It has been a little more historical, and hysterical, than we would have chosen," said Ron Prosor, Israel's ambassador to Britain, at a housewarming party at the embassy last Tuesday.

Only a few hours earlier, Miliband, the expected guest of honour at the embassy event, meticulously planned months ago, announced he would not be attending.

Possibly hoping to calm the waters, Miliband, speaking later in the evening, stressed that this had not been an expulsion of the Israeli diplomat per se, but a request.

"He has been asked to leave, which is not the same as being expelled," Miliband told the Foreign Press Association. "We asked – and the embassy agreed."

The timing of the British announcement came, according to sources, as a surprise to Prosor, who was urgently called out of a formal lunch Monday while visiting Jerusalem Mayor Nir Barkat and high level guests, to attend to the matter.

"Like any worthwhile friendship, the friendship between Britain and Israel has had its ups and downs. Today, we are experiencing both in one day," he said, noting that this year the two nations would celebrate 60 years of formal diplomatic relations.

The British government, according to Miliband, is in touch with all the countries who were affected by this affair – France, Australia, Germany and Ireland – and all are conducting their own investigations.

Miliband says use of British passports in the Dubai assassination shows disregard for U.K. sovereignty.

Mahmoud al-Mabhouh was killed in January in what Dubai police have said they are 99 per cent certain was a hit by Israel's Mossad spy agency. Israel has neither confirmed nor denied a role in the killing of Mabhouh.

Dubai authorities named 27 alleged members of the team that tracked and killed the Palestinian, and said they used fraudulent British, Irish, French, German and Australian passports to enter and depart from Dubai.

More than half of the people identified as responsible for the killing share the names of foreign-born Israeli nationals.

Miliband told parliament there were compelling reasons to believe Israel was responsible for the misuse of British passports in this case and said he had sought assurances that Israel would not misuse them again.

"Such misuse of British passports is intolerable," Miliband said. "It presents a hazard for the safety of British nationals in the region. It also represents a profound disregard for the sovereignty of the United Kingdom.

"The fact that this was done by a country which is a friend, with significant diplomatic, cultural, business and personal ties to the U.K., only adds insult to injury," he added. "No country or Government could stand by in such a situation.

Jewish film fest offers 'gems and surprises'

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Expect a glittering array of "gems and surprises" at the 18th annual Toronto Jewish Film Festival, says curator Ellie Skrow.

Viewers will be treated to 93 films from 18 countries, including Canada, Israel, Germany, Poland and the United States at this year's festival, which runs from April 17 to 25.

The lineup was formally unveiled last week at a press conference at Caplansky's Deli on College Street.

Leo Frank

A special series, "People of the Comic Book: The Creators of Superheroes, Graphic Novels & Toons," will celebrate the outsized role Jews played in the history of the comic book genre in the United States.

"Jews basically invented the comic book," Skrow said. "They were the innovators and pioneers."

During the golden age of comic books from roughly 1938 to 1950, Jews loomed large in the industry.

Their contributions will be acknowledged in a series of documentaries and features ranging from Comic Book Confidential to Fritz the Cat.

Complementing the screenings will be an art exhibition on the connection between Jews and comics at the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre.

Paul Buhle, author of Jews and the American Comics, will attend the festival, as will Harvey Pekar (American Splendor), graphic novelist Ben Katchor and filmmaker Gary Vanden-Bergh, who is currently making a documentary on Mad magazine illustrator Will Elder.

Helen Zuckerman, the festival's founder, predicted that the reach of "People of the Comic Book" will extend beyond the Jewish community.

Nuremberg: Its Lesson for Today will get its North American premiere at the festival.

Written and directed by Stuart Schulberg and completed in 1948, the documentary on the 1946 Nuremberg war crimes trial was screened in postwar Germany but suppressed in the United States for political reasons.

Schulberg's daughter, Sandra, and her collaborator, Josh Waletzky, have painstakingly restored the film, a historical document on the rise and fall of the Nazi regime.

The festival will also screen Ben Loeterman's The People V. Leo Frank, which is said to be the most comprehensive retelling of the Leo Frank affair in the United States. Frank, a northern businessman living in the deep south, was wrongfully accused of murder and in 1913 became the first and only Jew ever to be lynched on American soil.

The Warner brothers

As usual, there will be a number of Israeli movies at the festival, which will open with A Matter of Size and close with Ajami, Israel's 2010 Academy Award nominee for best foreign film.

There will be cinematic tributes to an Israeli novelist (Amos Oz: The Nature of Dreams), Hollywood studio titans (The Brothers Warner), a French documentarian (Claude Lanzmann: An Ode to Life), and a maverick Israeli movie director (Gitai in Search of his Carmel).

As well, the festival will present documentaries on a tiny sect in Israel (Lone Samaritan), a pivotal moment in Zionist history (Exodus: The True Story), an account of the Arab-Israeli conflict through the prism of the iconic Jaffa orange (Jaffa, The Orange's Clockwork), a Jewish athlete who competed for Nazi Germany in the summer Olympic Games (Berlin '36), an abandoned Arab village in Israel where bohemians from around the world gather (Achziv, A Place for Love), and Israeli haredi Jews (Haredim– A Documentary Trilogy).

Screenings will take place at four theatres: the Bloor Cinema (506 Bloor St. West), the Al Green Theatre (Miles Nadal JCC, 750 Spadina Ave.), Cineplex Odeon Sheppard Centre Cinemas (4861 Yonge St.) and Silver City Richmond Hill Cinemas (8771 Yonge St.).

Musical will sing the praises of Montreal deli

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The colourful history of Montreal's most famous deli and the eccentric characters that have been associated with it will come to the Montreal stage next year as a musical comedy.

Schwartz's: The Musical, written by and starring the comedy duo Bowser & Blue, is part of the Centaur Theatre's regular upcoming season and will be presented in March 2011.

The play, which will have a cast of 12 and all-original music, is loosely based on Bill Brownstein's 2006 book Schwartz's Hebrew Delicatessen: The Story, but will have a fictional story line about an ill-advised attempt by Torontonians to buy the restaurant and franchise it across the country.

Eventually, they come to learn that the little Jewish deli is about more than a product, it's an authentic part of Montreal that can't be transported.

George Bowser and Rick Blue had plenty of good material to work with. According to Bowser and Blue, who sang the play's opening song at the season unveiling, Schwartz's is emblematic of Montreal, and smoked meat is almost a sacrament. In fact, the theme song has it that saying smoked meat is just something you eat is like saying Maurice Richard is just a hockey player.

Blue emphasized the play is about having fun, and the duo will not touch on language or politics, which has been the bread-and-butter of their act for many years.

"The dreaded 'f' word in Schwartz's: The Musical is franchisation, not francization," he said. The "food police," not the "tongue troopers," will be the villains in this show.

"We workshopped Schwartz's: The Musical last fall and it went very well; we're just fine-tuning now," Blue said.

The past owners will make an appearance, but could each be the subject of a play on their own. Of course, the denizens of Schwartz's are also theatrical fodder – the brusque cutters and waiters, personalities from show business, sports and politics, as well as the less famous who hang out on The Main.

'The ideas just keep coming,' says novelist Joy Fielding

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

She calls it "the gift that keeps on giving." Joy Fielding, Canada's answer to Danielle Steel, is a well-oiled writing machine, full stop.

"The ideas just keep coming," said Fielding, a Toronto-based bestselling author who has just published her 21st novel, The Wild Zone (Doubleday), which, as usual, brims with passion, intrigue and secrets, and which the Globe and Mail described as a cliffhanger in a complimentary review.

Perenially prolific, she churns out novels effortlessly. "Writing comes easily to me," she said matter-of-factly in an interview in her elegant and spacious midtown condominium.

Recently, she finished her 22nd novel, Preferred Lies, which will be in stores next year.

Recognizing her talent for production, Fielding's publisher a decade ago asked her to increase her output. Could she write a novel a year? At first, she was concerned whether she would be able to withstand the pressure. But after accepting the challenge, she charged forward, guns blazing brightly.

"I think it has worked out pretty well," she said without the slightest trace of complacency. "I go from book to book, though I'm not chained to my desk. I take breaks. The creative juices are always flowing. The angst and self-flagellation are gone."

To Fielding, the secret of her success is apparent. "It's about imagination and discipline. You can't wait for inspiration."

Fielding, a 64-year-old University of Toronto graduate who majored in English literature, derives her ideas from newspapers, magazines, books, friends and her two daughters. "I'm aware of what goes on in the world. Everything is potential fodder for a book," she said. Usually, however, she is most inspired when she is in a relaxed mode.

After completing an outline in longhand, she sits down at her computer in her carpeted, book-lined study and starts writing. She spends four to eight hours a day on her craft, churning out about 2,500 words.

Once she has four to five chapters in hand, she shows them to a friend whose judgment she trusts implicitly. If the friend likes the manuscript, she proceeds. Yet Fielding takes nothing for granted. She rewrote the first 10 chapters of The Wild Zone three times.

In general, though, her most recent manuscripts have required only minor tweaking.

At the beginning of her career, rewrites were much more of a problem than today, she said, recalling that she rewrote her first four or five novels from top to bottom. "That was really painful," she said, wincing.

The hard work has paid off handsomely. She has produced a slew of bestsellers, notably See Jane Run and The Other Woman, and her novels, which generally focus on women in jeopardy, have been translated into 25 languages, including Hebrew.

Much to Fielding's astonishment, she is particularly popular in Germany.

"For some reason, they really embrace me. According to a survey, one in 10 Germans knows who I am." She chuckled, "I guess my German translator must be doing a good job. The German and Jewish sensibilities are not all that different."

Her favourite bestseller, See Jane Run, turns on a woman who, after awakening from a nightmare, has forgotten her name, age and identity.

Released in 1991, when she was already on the ascendancy, See Jane Run was made into a television movie. "It was one of those books that struck a chord," she mused. "A story where everything worked on all levels. Real characters, a fast-moving plot, well constructed and well written, and a great opening line."

Joy Fielding

Fielding admits that her main characters are a reflection of her own personality. "I put myself in the position of my characters. I have a very good understanding of me. That's why women 'get' the women I'm writing about."

Not surprisingly, the majority of her readers are women aged 16 to 60. Nevertheless, some of her most devoted fans are men, judging by their letters at least.

Although her characters tend to be generic in terms of their ethnicity, she has tagged some with obviously Jewish- sounding surnames.

Almost all her novels are set in the United States, where she and her husband, retired lawyer Warren Seyffert, maintain a home in Palm Beach, Fla. They intend to spend an increasing amount of time there, she said.

In her blog, Fielding observes that the American landscape seems best suitable for her themes of alienation and loss of identity. Yet two of her novels, Lost (2004) and Puppet (2005) unfold in Toronto, while her forthcoming novel, Preferred Lies, is about a Canadian woman living in Ireland.

Fielding, whose mother Anne was a housewife and whose father Leo was a costume jewellery salesman, has been a writer since childhood. "I always loved writing," she said, remembering that she submitted her first story to a magazine when she was eight. Although it was rejected, she continued writing through her teen years.

When she reached university, she decided she would be an actress. "I loved acting. As a child, I wrote little plays for me to star in."

At the University of Toronto, she won roles in campus plays. She also appeared in the 1965 Canadian romantic drama, Winter Kept Us Warm, the first Canadian English-language movie to be invited to the Cannes Film Festival.

Thinking she might make it in Hollywood, Fielding moved to Los Angeles in 1967. "I gave acting a try. I thought I was pretty good. I was always self-confident. I thought I'd be a star and win an Oscar."

Aside from landing a minor role in an episode of Gunsmoke and almost winning a part in Yentl, Fielding fell flat in Hollwood. "I hardly got sent out for auditions. I worked in a lot of banks as a teller and started writing again. I was unhappy in Los Angeles, a whole different world with different values."

She added, "In Los Angeles looks and image are everything. They don't read books, they read scripts. It's a culture of total self-absorption, full of plastic people. It was soul-destroying and so hard, a life of constant rejections. You're never good enough."

Returning to Toronto in 1970, she landed jobs in a succession of TV commercials and embarked on her first novel, The Best of Friends, which she dashed off in five weeks. "I must have been possessed."

Submitting it to five publishers, she was delighted to learn that two were interested in it. "I took the first offer I got," she said. "I was thrilled to death. It was so exciting. I thought, 'This is great.'"

Four more years would elapse before Fielding's second novel was published. But since then, she has established herself as a fixture in the industry. "It's been very lucrative," she said. "I hope to continue writing as long as I stay current and my imagination keeps working. As long as my mind is working, I'll go on. It's really fun. I enjoy the whole process."

Asked how she hopes to be remembered by future generations, she said, "As a literate storyteller, like Charles Dickens, who was very representative of the times and voiced the concerns of modern women."

Toronto author Margaret Atwood is one of several international recipients slated to receive a 2010 Dan David Prize, each worth $1 million. The Israeli-based awards are handed out annually for achievements having an outstanding scientific, technological, cultural or social impact within the three time dimensions of the past, present or future.

Margaret Atwood

Winner in the "present" time dimension, Atwood was cited for her body of more than 40 volumes of fiction, poetry and other forms, especially her three influential dystopian novels, The Handmaid's Tale (1985), Oryx and Crake (2003) and The Year of the Flood (2009). The Dan David Prize website also cited The Blind Assassin (2000), referring to it as "her most accomplished novel," although many readers would question that assertion.

Indian-Bengali novelist Amitav Ghosh, award-winning author of The Circle of Reason and Sea of Poppies, was also named a winner with Atwood in the "present" category. The award ceremony takes place in Israel on May 9 in the presence of Israeli President Shimon Peres.

Atwood, along with Ghosh and more than 20 other foreign authors, is also scheduled to participate in Jerusalem's second International Writers Festival, May 2 to 6. Theme of the festival is Hebrew literature and writers whose works have been translated into Hebrew. Other participating authors include Paul Auster, Jonathan Safran Foer, Jamaica Kincaid, Daniel Mendelsohn and Simon Sebag Montefiore.

Egyptian writer Hussein Serag, editor of the popular Egyptian magazine October and translator of former Israeli foreign minister Moshe Dayan's memoirs into Arabic, has also indicated he will attend even though he may suffer additional penalties at home. Although Egyptians may legally travel to Israel, the Egyptian Journalists Union has already barred him from writing after he recently admitted on television that he makes regular visits to Israel.

Passages: New York-born author Erich Segal, whose first novel Love Story became a bestseller and the basis of a popular film, has died in London, England, at the age of 72.

Segal, the son of a prominent Conservative rabbi, studied at Harvard and became a professor of Greek and Latin literature at Harvard, Yale, Princeton and Oxford. He wrote Love Story during Christmas break in 1969. The book began with the words: "What can you say about a 25-year-old girl who died? That she was beautiful. And brilliant. That she loved Mozart and Bach. And the Beatles. And me."

The book became the top bestselling novel of 1970 and was translated into 33 languages. It was made into a romantic tearjerker movie starring Ali McGraw as working-class Jenny Cavalleri and Ryan O'Neal as Harvard socialite Oliver Barrett IV. The movie retained one of the novel's most memorable – if patently untrue – lines: "Love means never having to say you're sorry."

In 1967, Segal wrote the screenplay for the animated Beatles movie Yellow Submarine and came up with the line, "Funny, you don't look blue-ish." He scripted a handful of other films and wrote several academic works. His other novels include The Class (1985) and Doctors (1988), each of which also became a bestseller.

Performer stages retrospective of her 30-year career

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

Toronto actor and singer Paula Wolfson is premièring her cabaret show When It All Comes True, a retrospective of her 30-year career in theatre, this month.

Wolfson has performed in numerous musical productions, including Les Misérables, Beauty and the Beast, White Christmas and A New Brain. She received a Dora Award for her performance in Shaking the Foundations.

"Audiences will see where it all began, with my time as a music instructor at Bayview Glen Day Camp," says Wolfson of her one-night show at the Toronto Centre for the Arts' Studio Theatre on April 12.

"When I realized I couldn't haul the piano out under the trees to teach music, somebody handed me a guitar and someone else handed me a Joni Mitchell album and that was the end of that. So, I learned to play guitar and started to do folk nights," she said.

Wolfson started auditioning for paid gigs and found that playing an instrument increased her opportunities. "I've got my Grade 8 piano, and I learned guitar on my own. I have an autoharp, a washboard and a ukulele. I'm a one-woman band!" she said.

Dora Award-winning pianist and musical arranger, conductor and composer David Warrack will be accompanying Wolfson at the première of When It All Comes True. It's the first time the two Toronto theatre veterans will share the same stage.

Paula Wolfson

The show is an evening filled with eclectic songs, including the music of Canadian composers – Mitchell to Carol Pope and Lisa Lambert – as well as stories about the magic of show business. The songs Wolfson will perform relate to the stories she tells.

The show encourages audience interaction with a sing-along and pop quizzes with prizes. Also included are Broadway classics and a medley of tunes by Burt Bacharach, who is near and dear to Wolfson's heart.

"I was hosting karaoke at a wedding fair in Vancouver. While singing I declared to the audience that Burt Bacharach was my personal saviour. A woman came back after the show and asked if Jesus was my personal saviour, I didn't know what to do… so I said yes because I didn't want to tell her that I was a Jewish girl with a penchant for singing killer ballads from the '70s."

Wolfson has written another cabaret show, Between Engagements, which is geared to the corporate world, and she plans to increase her cabaret repertoire to include another couple of offerings.

She also tours with Smile Theatre, a theatre company catering to elderly audiences. Wolfson was touched when the company performed at Baycrest and Rabbi Asher Turin told the performers that they were performing a mitzvah for people who couldn't get out, and that it was bringing a little smile into their lives.

Wolfson has an artist educator certificate from the Royal Conservatory of Music, which allows her to go to schools and use music to teach curriculum.

She also finds time to run a business. Wolfson, who has a horticultural certificate from Guelph University, operates My Garden's Keeper, a company that tends urban gardens.

Wolfson describes herself as an extroverted introvert who enjoys spending time on her own. She is a member of Shir Libeynu, a Reconstructionist Jewish organization.

Tickets for When It All Comes True ($25) can be purchased online at ticketmaster.ca; by calling Ticketmaster at 416-872-1111; from the website, studio5040 cabarets.com; or in person at the theatre box office.

Krakow is one of Europe's great historical cities

By WOLF ARNOLD
Special to The CJN

If you're looking for unspoiled countryside and moderate prices, Poland is a good choice, especially if you travel in the south of country, and in particular, in the region that spreads north from the Tatra Mountains.

These giant granite formations, reaching 2,500 metres, are the highest peaks between the Alps and the Ural Mountains. The river valleys of the Tatra foothills, with their clean air, their health resorts, pure water and scenic settings, attract visitors and health-seekers alike.

In the valleys of the Raba, Dunajec and Poprad rivers, the resort towns of Krynica, Szczawinica, Rabka, Muszyna and Piwniczna are renowned for their mineral springs and their micro-climates (a local atmospheric zone where the climate differs from the surrounding area) that possess healing properties for various ailments. While Rabka is known for treating children's ailments, Krynica, the largest of the spas, draws some 50,000 patients a year who seek relief from diabetes and circulatory and digestive diseases.

If you're looking for excitement, you can go river rafting in the Dunajec Valley, in the Pieniny Mountains National Park. The Dunajec River, which is flanked by towering cliffs, cuts through the valley in sharp turns and loops. It's one of the most beautiful river gorges in Europe.

Farther north lies Nowy Sacz, at the confluence of the Dunajec and Kamienica rivers, a pleasant market town from which on a clear day the snowcapped Tatras can be seen. Famous in the history of Chassidism under the name of Zans, Nowy Sacz acquired a sizable Jewish population when they started to settle there in 1469. The town became a major religious centre in the 17th century.

The Town Hall at Nowy Sacz

The Guild Hall in Krakow

People in the market square, the largest functional square in Europe. [Wolf Arnold photos]

In 1939, the Jewish population still numbered 10,000, but it has now dwindled to an unknown few. Only the Jewish cemetery, looking utterly neglected, and the former synagogue, now a gallery and a museum of the history of the Jewish people of Nowy Sacz, remain as the only tangible traces.

Medieval houses in Stary Sacz, which is Nowy Sacz's sister town a few kilometres away, surround a cobblestone market square. But the town's main attraction is a 13th-century monastery that is famous for its artwork, to which the Italian artists Giovanni de Simoni and Baldassare Fontana contributed.

The Italian connection is evident in the city of Krakow, the ancient capital of Poland. Enter the vast market square, called Rynek, and the Renaissance Guild Hall of the cloth merchants will catch your eye. If you have been to Italy, you can't help but think of an Italian palazzo, for the Guild Hall bears a resemblance to the Palazzo della Raggione in Padua. Definitely southern in spirit, it was built by Polish and Italian architects.

The interior has shops that sell all kinds of goods and souvenirs, and outside, cafés, with their colourful parasols, make you want to linger for coffee with a delicious cake or a fantastic ice cream.

The Rynek measures 40,000 square metres and is the largest functional market square in Europe. The square is an ongoing street theatre, alive with people, pigeons, flower sellers and cafés. Surrounding patrician houses, splendid in their baroque and Renaissance facades, add to this urban beauty.

A short walk takes you from the Rynek to the Florian Gate at the old-city wall. Here, during any summer day, local artists display their creations. The ancient city wall is covered with paintings that tempt you to take home a souvenir. Beyond the gate, under chestnut trees, a promenade leads to Wavel Castle, the former residence of the Polish kings.

Declared by UNESCO as a world natural and cultural heritage site, Krakow has always been the intellectual focal point of the country. The home of astronomer Nicolaus Copernicus (1473- 1543), the city is a must-see on a journey to Poland. Its university is the alma mater of Pope John Paul II.

From the belfry of the Wavel, you can enjoy a panoramic view of Krakow, one of the great historical cities of Europe.

Surviving in Berlin during the Nazi era

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Berlin, the capital of Germany, had a Jewish population of about 160,000 when Adolf Hitler and his Nazi regime assumed power in 1933.

But by the summer of 1941, on the eve of the first deportation of Jews to ghettos and concentration camps in eastern Europe, the Jewish community had dwindled to 65,000 members, the remainder having emigrated.

In the next four years, 55,000 Jews in Berlin were deported to the east by rail in 65 transports. Up to 1,500 Jews survived underground as "submarines," while 4,700 made it through the war thanks to marriages to Christians.

The plight of Jewish Berliners during the Nazi era is detailed in Jews in Nazi Berlin: From Kristallnacht to Liberation (The University of Chicago Press), a lavishly illustrated book of essays edited by Beate Meyer, Hermann Simon and Chana Schutz.

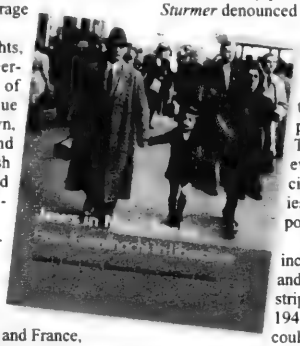
The topics in this fine and comprehensive volume run the gamut from emigration and the expropriation of property to deportation and survival.

The introductory essay, written by Hermann Simon, deals with the year 1938, which was indeed a fateful one. "One had the feeling that disaster was on the horizon," he quotes a German Jew as saying.

Until then, Jews still living in Berlin thought that they could somehow manage. But with the passage of a series of laws and regulations further isolating them, the last illusions vanished. The vandalization of Jewish shops and the arrest of 1,500 Jews, followed by the deportation of 17,000 Polish Jewish nationals throughout Germany, deepened the gloom. The nation-wide pogroms in November were the final straw.

Christian Dirks, in his essay, focuses on May and June 1938, which saw an increase in the number of anti-Semitic attacks in Berlin, a boycott of Jewish shops on the Kurfurstendamm – an elegant shopping thoroughfare – and raids on cafes. These events, Dirks says, were preceded by a decision by Propaganda Minister Joseph Goebbels to step up the pace of anti-Semitic measures in Berlin.

Michael Schabitz, in an essay titled The Flight and Expulsion of German Jews, points out that Germany's policy was to choke off Jewish life and encourage the emigration of Jews.



Despite being deprived of their rights, only a quarter of the Jews living in Germany had left the country by the end of 1937. Many Jews hesitated to leave due to family bonds, the fear of the unknown, a lack of emigration opportunities and Germany's policy of Aryanizing Jewish property. With the outbreak of World War II, emigration became virtually impossible.

Tracing the tide of emigration, Schabitz lists three waves.

The first one took place immediately after Hitler became chancellor on Jan. 30, 1933. The emigrants settled in neighbouring countries such as Holland and France, though Zionist organizations vigorously promoted Palestine as a destination.

The second wave began with the promulgation of the 1935 Nuremberg laws, which officially rendered German Jews second-class citizens and forbade mixed marriages. The third and final wave began with the heightening of anti-Jewish restrictions in the spring of 1938 and culminated with Kristallnacht.

Beate Mayer's essay is on Aryanization, a euphemism for confiscation of property. Aryanization did not formally come into force until after Kristallnacht. Up to that point, the transfer of Jewish property into non-Jewish hands was not a priority.

Mayer, in her piece, concentrates on the Aryanization of the Garbaty family cigarette factory, which employed hundreds of workers and was one of the first in Germany to produce brand name cigarettes. As she suggests, the fate of the Garbaty plant was sealed when the Nazi newspaper Sturmer denounced its products as "Jewish."

In his essay, Albert Meirer methodically retraces the repression of Berlin's Jewish community, from the curt dismissal of Jewish civil servants to the demeaning restrictions that hampered the freedom of movement of Jews. They were forbidden to attend cultural events of any kind, barred from theatres, cinemas, concert halls, museums, libraries, parks, sports facilities and swimming pools.

Signs reading "No Jews Allowed" were increasingly common in hotels, restaurants and cafes. In systematic fashion, Jews were stripped of their livelihoods. By September 1941, in a transition to extermination, they could no longer use public transportation or keep pets and were forced to wear the yellow star.

Chana Schutz's essay on Zionists in Berlin reminds readers that the city was once the headquarters of the Zionist movement, and that Otto Warburg, a renowned scientist, was its president from 1911 to 1920. Nonetheless, Schutz says, the number of dues-paying Zionists was never high in Berlin, nor in other cities in Germany. With Hitler's accession to power, interest in Zionism and immigration to Palestine grew.

The figures tell the story. In 1933, 7,600 Jews immigrated to the Holy Land. In 1934 and 1935, the figures were 9,800 and 8,600, respectively. They fell to 3,700 and 4,800 in 1937 and 1938 as Britain tightened entry rules.

Diana Schulle's essay concerns itself with the Rosenstrasse protest of February 1943, a singular event in the annals of Nazi Germany.

When the Gestapo arrested about 1,700 Jewish men of partial Jewish ancestry and in mixed marriages on that historic day, their indignant Christian wives and relatives mounted an unprecedented demonstration in front of the building where they were held.

Relenting under their pressure, the Nazis released many of the Jewish prisoners and, still more incredibly, recalled 25 men who had already been dispatched to Auschwitz. Calling their protest unique, Schulle quotes American historian Nathan Stolzfus as saying that the Rosenstrasse incident was "the only instance of mass German opposition against the National Socialist destruction of Jewry."

Beate Mayer's essay on deportation starts with the first transport on Oct. 18, 1941 and concludes with the last one March 27, 1945. Summing up the fate of the Jews of Berlin, she says that 90,000 emigrated, 55,000 were murdered, 7,000 committed suicide and 8,000 survived in mixed marriages, concentration camps and in hiding.

Christian Dirks, in Snatchers: The Berlin Gestapo's Jewish Informants, writes about the Jews who saved themselves by betraying their fellow Jews.

Dirks focuses on the most notorious of the lot, Stella Kubler and her husband, Rolf Isaaksohn, who roamed the streets in search of prey.

Barbara Schieb's and Michael Schabitz's respective essays deal with the so-called submarines, the Jews who went into hiding and survived against all odds with the help of Christians.

Schieb concentrates on a couple, Walter and Leonie Frankenstein, while Schabitz fleshes out Hans Rosenthal's tale of survival. After the war, Rosenthal became the most celebrated television host in West Germany.

What an ascent to fame after so much hardship.

Cycling for togetherness in South Africa

By SUZANNE BELLING
JTA

JOHANNESBURG — The Jews call it b'yachad. The blacks call it ubuntu.

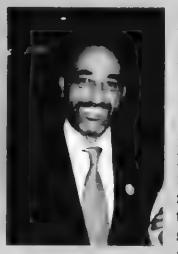
Whatever the term, it was the spirit of togetherness that marked the launching Sunday of the bar mitzvah-year Cycalive, a 400-mile bike ride fundraiser from Johannesburg to Durban that brings together Jewish students from the Torah Academy Boys' High School of Johannesburg with students from the Moletsane High and Pace secondary schools in the black township of Soweto.

The idea is to promote togetherness and road safety, and raise funds for the participating schools from Soweto. Cycalive usually raises about $18,000 each year.

The date of this year's launch, March 21, marked South Africa's Human Rights Day and the 50th anniversary of the Sharpeville Massacre, when police opened fire in 1960 on protesters in Soweto, killing 69 people.

The anniversary was also the first official Mandela Day event on the 2010 calendar leading up to anti-apartheid activist and ex-president Nelson Mandela's 92nd birthday on July 18.



Chief Rabbi Warren Goldstein

This year's cycle kicked off amid a raucous celebration, complete with police escorts, the roar of motorcycles – many with Jewish riders from Steelwings and Rolling Thunder – and the rousing music of the brass band of the Field Band Foundation from the nearby town of Springs.

The band comprises once-underprivileged black youths trained and sponsored by South African Jewish philanthropist Bertie Lubner.

Before the students set off pedaling, Chief Rabbi Warren Goldstein said, "This is more than a physical journey, it is a journey of hope. The central principle is we are all human beings created in the image of God."

Goldstein added that it was also a celebration of "the power of nation building" through sport, the innocence of youth and the simple joys of life in our technology-rushed society.

One student on the ride, Raphael Leepilo of Moletsane, told JTA, "I am very happy. I have never been to Durban, never seen the sea. I am a practising Christian and am now going to learn about the Jewish religion."

Sibusiso Nanga of Pace was looking forward to an "amazing experience."

Yosef Jameson of the Torah Academy said, "I think it's going to be a bonding session, getting to know people from different cultures."

Rabbi Motti Hadar, principal of Torah Academy Boys' High, who as a student there was at the head of his class and cycled to Durban, said this was his second ride from Johannesburg to Durban.

The ride "is a great opportunity for the boys. It helps them learn about others and, more importantly, about themselves," he said.

Rabbi Dovid Hazdan, the Torah Academy's dean, accompanied the students on their journey and said they're traveling with their "tzitzit flying in the wind."

Pace principal Dan Zimba said, "In terms of our kids learning Jewish culture and that there are other religions, this is their first contact. It promotes understanding, respect and recognition."

Since the first Cycalive 13 years ago, the participating schools from Soweto have become among the best in the township. The funds raised by the event helped them improve their library, set up intercom systems, and purchase computers and audio-visual aids.

The communications manager for the Nelson Mandela Foundation sent a message to the participants praising their effort.

"We appreciate your commitment to Mandela Day," said the organization's spokesperson, Sello Hatang.

"Please spread the word as you stop in villages, towns and cities, in churches, synagogues, temples, mosques, schools and hospitals along the way on the road to Durban."

Marlene Bethlehem, former deputy chairwoman of the Commission for the Promotion and Protection of the Rights of Cultural, Religious and Linguistic Communities, commended the Cycalive organizers for bringing people of different backgrounds together.

"Where there is no vision, the people will perish," she said.

The students did not take the highway, but took a longer route to Durban. When they arrived there Thursday, they were expected to parade through the city's streets accompanied by traffic police and the Durban Field Band.

Civic and Jewish community leaders from the coastal city were to meet them on the steps of City Hall at the ride's conclusion.

Sledge hockey goalie ends career at Paralympics

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

It wasn't supposed to end this way.

The Canadian team was ranked first in the world and they were playing on home ice in front of thousands of enthusiastic fans.

The men's and women's teams had just wrapped up gold medals and now it was the sledge hockey team's chance to make it a trifecta at the Vancouver Olympics and Paralympic Games.

But it was not to be. In a critical game against Japan, the Canadians couldn't find the back of the net and dropped a 3-1 shocker to end their chance for back-to-back gold medals.

Said Japanese head coach Kojin Nakakita afterward, "Canada would beat us if we played them 1,000 times, we're going to lose 999. But not this one."

In the bronze medal game that followed, Canada fell 2-1 to Norway, leaving them completely out of the medals.

Goalie Paul Rosen, who backstopped the Canucks to a gold in Turin four years before, was "extremely disappointed. I was looking forward to not just being in the gold medal game, but winning it."

Unfortunately, the hockey gods – and some will say the referee – were not with them that day against the Scandinavians.

Canadian goalie Paul Rosen stretches out to make an acrobatic save during the recent Paralympic Games in Vancouver. Despite strong goaltending, Canada finished out of the medals. [Photo © Hockey Canada]

Rosen, however, is "content with the way I played. I think I had one of the best tournaments I had in my career."

The bottom line was that the Canadians just couldn't score when they needed to. They scored on their single shot in the third period, but Norway tied the game after what was seen on the Canadian side as a bad ref's call that awarded the Scandinavians a penalty shot that they capitalized on.

The winner was a shot with only seconds left to play that caromed off a Canadian defenceman and over Rosen's glove.

"It just wasn't meant to be," he said.

In the end, the United States won the gold, Japan got the silver and Norway the bronze.

The loss not only ended Rosen's run for another gold, but marked the end of a remarkable career. The netminder, who is closing in on age 50, announced he was hanging up the sledge and getting out of competitive hockey.

It wasn't the cap on a 10-year career he was hoping for, but he remains "very proud" of what he's accomplished.

On the ice, he has the gold from Turin as the centrepiece of his trophy case – along with the MVP award from that tournament – but he says representing Canada was reward in itself.

"It's been an honour competing for the last 10 years. I'm very proud of it. I'm proud to be an athlete for this great country."

What's more, he takes great satisfaction from the example he's set for other Canadians with disabilities. He's received numerous calls and e-mails telling him what an inspiration he's been, including a moving testimonial from an eight-year-old to whom he gave his blocker. "That blew me away," he said.

He also hopes he's served as a role model for young Jews who also are disabled.

"I'm an extremely proud Jew, and I want to help the Jewish community so disabled Jewish kids realized that life is not over," he said.

Back in his youth, Rosen was an able-bodied skater who played AAA midget hockey.

He broke his leg in a game and it never did heal, despite 24 surgeries. On a trip to Israel he was told by a doctor he faced death if the leg was not amputated. Rosen believes he owes his life to the Israeli medical system.

In 2000, a year after losing his leg, he took up sledge hockey and a year after that, he made the national team.

It was a natural transition. "To play disabled sport was the next stage," he said.

His success and the impact he's had on other disabled people has taught him that nothing is impossible. Since he lost his leg at age 39, "my life has been better than it was with the leg. It depends on your mindset."

In recent years he's found a new love of his life – Louise Berman – a woman he went to kindergarten with in 1965 whose paths crossed over the years but with whom he didn't reconnect until a couple of years ago.

And he's setting his sights on a shift of career that will keep him connected to hockey. A motivational speaker by occupation, he hopes to parlay his talents into the role of a hockey commentator, perhaps even be part of the crew that covers the next Olympics and Paralympics in Sochi, Russia.

And as for the Canadian sledge hockey team, he's – what else? – optimistic about their future.

"By Sochi," he promises, "we'll be ready."

Chabad holds fashion fundraiser for women's shelter

Compiled by CJN Staff

The Bay's flagship downtown Toronto store recently hosted Chabad Markham's annual fashion show, attended by nearly 500 women.

Three generations – bubbies, their daughters and children – modelled designer clothes in the store's Arcadian Ballroom. The guest of honour was Judy Feld Carr, who rescued more than 3,000 Syrian Jews.

When the women arrived, they were ushered up to the eighth floor of the store and were treated to cocktails and hors d'oeuvres, donated by Tiara Culinary Catering and Joe Elmaleh.

The women were then seated in the glamorous Arcadian Ballroom, where they were welcomed by MC Erica Ehm, a former MuchMusic host and the creator of the website YummyMummyClub.ca.

The co-chairs of the event, Allison Solomon and Joanne Herr, welcomed the representatives of the women's shelter Alternate Short Term Emergency Housing (ASTEH) and presented them with a plaque and a cheque on behalf of the Chabad.

Tehillim were then recited for those in need by Shira Klasner and Aviva Forer, rebbetzins of the Chabad of Markham community.

Opening remarks were made by Rebbetzin Goldie Plotkin. She spoke about the inspiration she received from her grandmother and how women can make a difference today, adding that women in leadership roles are changing the course of our history. Plotkin spoke about empowering ourselves and others with the knowledge that we all can make a difference. She then introduced the guest of honour, Feld Carr, as a true example of a woman who makes a difference.

Feld Carr mesmerized the audience with her poignant story of her heroic efforts to save the Syrian Jews.

When Feld Carr heard about the plight of the Syrian Jewish community and their being imprisoned and tortured in Syria, she raised thousands of dollars and over a period of 28 years rescued each and every surviving Jewish family and helped bring them to safety. She urged the women in the audience to go home and see how they can make a difference and change the course of Jewish history.

Feld Carr also told the audience about her daughter's involvement with Chabad in Virginia and how incredible the group's shluchim were when her family needed help and guidance. Chabad was there with meals, friendship and comfort. Feld Carr stressed the importance of the saying, "Kol Yisrael areivim ze lazeh," all Jews are responsible for one another.

The crowd was then treated to a fabulous, very entertaining fashion show. "A celebration of the generations," was the theme of the show, as three generations modelled on the catwalk, showing off designer clothing in honour of the upcoming holiday of Passover. The music that accompanied the show kept the crowd clapping.

The evening was orchestrated by co-chairs Allison Solomon and Joanne Herr and their team – Julie Goldentuler, Mandy Gnesin, Stella Saul, Kim Cohen, Romy Pilarski, Jackie Brenkel, Robyn Green, Heather Aaron, Yonet Blanch, Teri Cohen, Illona Kibel and Adi Tooch.

A private shopping experience was the final highlight of the evening. The entire Bay@Queen Street was kept open till 10 p.m. for the guests of the Chabad of Markham event.

REMEMBERING OUR YESTERDAYS

By BILL GLADSTONE

A national convention of the Federation of Zionist Societies of Canada drew more than 250 delegates to Toronto in 1910. Energetic meetings were held at the Lyric and Lyceum theatres, and distinguished visiting rabbis exhorted from the pulpits of Goel Tzedec Congregation and Temple Holy Blossom on Shabbat. Mayor George Geary welcomed the visitors to the city, and local newspapers declared their sympathy with Zionist ideals. Pictured, a group of delegates pose on the steps of an unidentified building (not Goel Tzedec).

But they are not enough

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

It's that time again. Israeli Apartheid Week has come and gone. The Swedes are acting out, and anti-Semitism quietly operates under slimy rocks, keeping a low profile, until barn, "Gaza" happens again. The danger is there. Do we see it? Are we acting?

Diaspora and Israeli Jewry make world-class software, hardware and medical equipment. We create wealth, write books, win Oscars, are bank presidents and chancellors of universities, and even grow football, hockey and baseball stars.

Our ability to create communities and organizations is unmatched. We have friends in the right places (not enough) because we are loyal. This is not ego. This is pride.

We are better positioned and developed than ever before to fight anti-Semitism, know who our friends are and make many more.

But we are not doing these things,

I write this to you in the voice of Ze'ev Jabotinsky. This visionary Zionist and Jewish activist exclaimed to European Jewry in the 1930s that they were "living on the edge of the volcano." They did not listen, and a chapter was written for us in which the protagonist, we the Jewish People, fell off a cliff. Recall your falling dreams and the feeling in your gut when you were unable to grab onto a single branch.

Jabotinksy was right. Few listened. We fell, and toppled hard. The ground has not since reached us.

Jewish organizations are doing a splendid job of fighting anti-Semitism, but they cannot do it alone, although they often want to. Jewish community workers work courageously, but like a pianist, they can only play one march at a time. They are not enough.

The State of Israel protects us, as God did the Jewish People in the desert. Our manna is their existence. The world knows Israel embraces us and will rescue us should we be taken hostage by this era's highwaymen, but that is not enough. Israel is overextended and small. It is not enough.

When anti-Semitism crawls out from underneath that mossy, bug-infested rock – and it will – all the organizations and professional staff will be surrounded by wagon trains of hatred creating deafening noises. They will know then that they are not enough.

I therefore, once again, call upon our leadership and every Jewish community member in the world to assemble and create, through our vast treasures, a world body whose mandate is to develop and implement a strategy to fight anti-Semites and find and make friends with non-Jews.

I am asking you not to put this article down, but rather to post it around your house as a wake-up for you and your family from an unreal sleep. Anti-Semitism is here.

Wake up and recognize that we are the most blessed people in the history of personkind. We can learn Torah freely, debate politics, compose symphonies, read poetry, visit Thailand, drive a Hummer, sleep peacefully and wear silk and cashmere. We have it all.

And with this comes responsibility to act. I ask you to ponder your comfort and then think about the Jews of France, Sweden and Venezuela. They are us. They are in trouble.

Tell our leaders it's time we designed such an entity. We must stop crying over our losses and bemoaning anti-Semitism. The shivah is over. We must instead fight. Fight. Fight. Fight.

Do so, oh sleepy brothers and sisters. Toronto is a good place to start.

Being blessed in Jerusalem

Hundreds of Kohanim blessed some 10,000 worshipers at the Western Wall last week. It marked the 40th year that such gatherings have been held at the Western Wall during the pilgrimage holidays of Passover and Sukkot. The chief rabbis of Israel, Rabbi Yona Metzger and Rabbi Shlomo Amar, and Western Wall Rabbi Shmuel Rabinovich held a reception at the Western Wall pavilion following the event.

Israel's angel of mercy

By ABIGAIL KLEIN LEICHMAN
Israel21c

BE'ER SHEVA, Israel — Caring for terminally ill Bedouins in the Negev desert may not be a popular medical specialty, but Dr. Yoram Singer was raised to believe in equality among people.

He said his European parents also taught him that "if you want to do something, you can always find a way to do it."

Late last year, Singer received an award from Ben-Gurion University of the Negev in recognition of his twice-weekly visits to the tents and shacks in unrecognized Bedouin villages. The medical director of the home palliative care unit of the Clalit Health Services health fund and chair of the Israeli Association of Palliative Care, Singer was described at the award ceremony as "an angel of mercy."

"I think an important part of being an adult is helping the helpless, trying to do something in places where there is nothing," he said.

Singer was born in Canada in 1953, grew up in Switzerland and immigrated on his own to Israel after high school. He began his career in palliative care, which aims to alleviate symptoms and improve the quality of life for chronically or terminally ill patients, in 1991, when he was invited to head the newly founded palliative care unit at Ben-Gurion University's faculty of health sciences in partnership with the Israel Cancer Association and Clalit Health Services.

Dr. Yoram Singer [Israel21c photo]

Singer estimates that throughout Israel, no more than 15 per cent of those needing palliative, end-of-life care actually receive it. His ambition is to build up a larger and more comprehensive network of services, including inpatient hospice units.

Young Canadians flock to fellowship program

By LANCE DAVIS, SAMUEL KONIG and BENJAMIN SHINEWALD

For the first time in its 23-year history, a significant contingent of young Canadian leaders attended the most recent Nahum Goldmann Fellowship Program.

Held on the Croatian island of Pag, the program brought together some 50 young Jewish leaders from around the world who spent a week learning about a wide range of subjects related to Jewish life.

The fellowship is sponsored by the Memorial Foundation for Jewish Culture, whose largely unsung work has a significant impact on the Jewish world.

Funded in part by German reparation money and founded 45 years ago by Nahum Goldmann, the legendary president of the World Jewish Congress and the World Zionist Federation, the foundation aims to reconstruct Jewish cultural life around the world, especially in Europe in light of the double devastation as a result of the Shoah and communism.

Guest Voice

The foundation tries to achieve its aims by supporting a new generation of scholars, intellectuals, academics, writers, artists, rabbis, educators and other Jewish communal professionals. Its greatest impact seems to be in former Iron Curtain countries.

The fellowship brings together a culturally and religiously diverse group. The meeting in Pag attracted lay leaders and professionals from Croatia, India, Macedonia, France, South Africa, Belarus, Australia, Poland, Panama, Israel and the United States, as well as Canada. Some fellows came from centres with large Jewish populations, while others came from small towns where the Jewish population numbered in the dozens.

The intellectual focus of the week-long conference was on Jewish textual study, social theory and the practical application of different leadership models.

Some of the Jewish world's stellar scholars taught at the program. Among the scholars were Prof. David Myers of UCLA; Moshe Halbertal of the Hebrew University in Jerusalem; Prof. Ismar Schorsch, the former chancellor of the Jewish Theological Seminary; Rabbi Saul Berman of New York University Law School; Prof. Benny Ish Shalom of Beit Morasha in Jerusalem and Steven Bayme of the American Jewish Committee.

Over the years, the foundation has awarded scholarships and fellowships to more than 13,000 men and women, many of whom were thus enabled to subsequently step into leadership positions in their respective communities. One such recipient was Chief Rabbi Eliezer Aloni of Croatia.

The foundation has also assisted in the publication of almost 4,000 books related to Jewish culture in over 25 languages. More than 600 books in Russian and eastern European languages were distributed behind the Iron Curtain during the two decades before the fall of communism.

The foundation is represented in Canada by the Canadian Jewish Congress. Canadians attending this year's program included Samuel Konig, national director of National Jewish Campus Life in Toronto; Lance Davis, executive director of the Calgary Jewish Community Council; Rabbi Jeni Friedman, formerly of Edmonton and now of Temple Beth Sholom in Roslyn Heights, N.Y.; Noah Slepkov, formerly of St. Catherines, Ont., and now of Tel Aviv; Guido Setton, formerly of Vancouver, Montreal and Argentina and now at the Jewish Federation of Tulsa, Okla.; Robin Nobel, formerly of Montreal and now at the Rothschild Foundation in London, England, and Benjamin Shinewald, national executive director of the Canadian Jewish Congress.

The fellowship is held annually. It alternates between locations in Israel and the Diaspora and is open to those ranging in age from 25 to 40.

More information is available at www.mfjc.org or http://ngfp.org/.

War-related stress found among Sderot's residents

By RON CSILLAG
Special to The CJN

That Israelis inhabit a tense land is not new. Stress levels in Israel have long been found as higher than average, which is unsurprising in a country that's perennially in a state of war.

But now a Canadian-born Israeli expert has hard data to show that among some young people in the western Negev city of Sderot, war-related stress led to damaged cognitive functions and impaired memories.

The impairments were "subtle but significant," but also temporary, according to research carried out by Ora Kofman, a psychology professor at Ben-Gurion University of the Negev.

The Montreal-born Kofman tested 43 healthy college students aged 20 to 30 — civilians who studied at the local Sapir College and lived in Sderot in 2007. During that year, prior to Israel's war in Gaza, Qassam rockets fired from Gaza one kilometre away rained on the town at the rate of 15 to 50 a day, with just 15 seconds warning.

Sderot became the symbol for Israeli suffering under the rocket fire. MSNBC reported during the attacks that "nearly everyone" in the town of 20,000 was "traumatized by the frequent sound of air-raid sirens and explosions of incoming projectiles."

For her study, conducted in the spring of 2008, Kofman divided her subjects into three groups: those who lived, studied and were tested in Sderot; those who lived and studied in Sderot, but were tested in Be'er Sheva, well away from the rocket attacks, and a control group of students who studied, lived and were tested in a safe zone northeast of Sderot.

Impairments and deficits were found only in the first group, suggesting that the trauma was "context-dependent," says Kofman. Also, the general evidence showed that the students who lived in Sderot were jumpier and more alert than usual.

The Jews of Europe today

From the editor's desk...

Next week, on the 27th of Nisan (April 11 this year), we commemorate Yom Hashoah v'Hagvurah. Sixty-five years after the near total destruction of European Jewry, it is appropriate that we reflect upon the "condition" of our kinfolk, the Jews of Europe.

Using figures published by the Jewish Virtual Library for the year 2006, Jews comprise barely more than one quarter of one per cent of the total population of the 15 original countries of the European Union (EU). Of the 386 million people who lived in the original 15-member EU, some one million are Jews.

Of the 460 million people who live in the current 25-member-country EU, some one million are Jews.

The largest Jewish community in Europe, by far, is in France. Some 491,500 Jews live there. Indeed, the French community is the third-largest community in the world after Israel and the Unites States.

Parenthetically, it should be noted, that the 373,500 Jews of Canada constitute the fourth-largest Jewish community in the world!

After France, the next largest Jewish community in the 25-member EU is that of the United Kingdom with a population of 297,000. Some 118,000 Jews live in Germany.

The demographic statistic, however, that is so very sorrowful and staggering to note, that settles most heavily in the collective hollowed heart is the fact that where in 1939, more than three million Jews once lived in Poland, today there are but 3,200.

Typical of Jews wherever we have resided, one of our chief concerns has always been for the well-being, not to mention the survival, of our co-religionists. Thus, in each respective community, there is a organizational structure of lay and professional leaders advocating on behalf of communal needs and giving expression to community concerns.

The European Jewish Congress (EJC) links all the communities of the EU, as well as an additional 15 in eastern Europe and in North Africa. Since 2007, its president has been Moshe Kantor, a community activist and philanthropist from Russia.

The website of the EJC describes the body as "a leading Jewish secular umbrella organization that co-ordinates 40 national Jewish communities in Europe, encompassing 2.5 million Jews. The EJC's goal is to address the world's most pressing issues: protecting human rights, fighting xenophobia and anti-Semitism, promoting interfaith dialogue, implementing cultural and educational programs, and remembering the Holocaust and other tragedies that claimed millions of human lives throughout the world."

In light of the EJC mission's statement and when one looks at the pronouncements and press releases of the EJC, one quickly sees, not surprisingly, that the issues that concern Jews in North America also concern Jews in Europe.

Moshe Kantor

It could not be any other way.

It should not be any other way if we are to be always and ever faithful to the millennia-old maxim kol Yisrael arevim zeh lazeh (the entire peoplehood of Israel cares one for the other).

A quick glance at some of the major news items last month affecting the Jews of Europe prove the point.

• "The EU has condemned all the settlement activities," Spanish Foreign Miguel Angel Moratinos said at the monthly meeting of EU Foreign Ministers in Brussels. Spain currently holds the EUs rotating presidency. "We ask for a total freeze of settlement activity. We will pursue this policy."

The EU is "very disappointed by the position of the Israeli government. I think I can say very clearly that Jerusalem is not Tel Aviv," said Luxembourg Foreign Minister Jean Asselborn. Asselborn's comment was in reference to a declaration made by Israel's Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu [that Israel will continue to build homes in the Jerusalem area]. "The Netanyahu announcement is completely, utterly unacceptable." Finnish Foreign Minister Alexander Stubb said.

• "The EJC has expressed deep disappointment that the European Parliament passed a resolution today [March 10] endorsing the Goldstone report.

"Dr. Moshe Kantor, president of the European Jewish Congress, led the lobbying efforts in the European Parliament and told the parliament group leaders and members of Europe's Parliament (MEPs) that the endorsement of the Goldstone report would be a blow for the peace process."

• "The EU parliament urges Hamas' immediate release of Gilad Schalit.

"MEPs meeting in plenary session in Strasbourg, France, [March 12] also called upon Hamas to grant Sgt. Schalit rights and privileges pursuant to the Geneva Convention."

In 1939, there were approximately 18 million Jews in the world. In 1945 alas, that figure was reduced to 12 million. Sixty-five years later that number has increased by about one million, to 13 million.

More people live in the larger urban areas of each of Tokyo, Mexico City, Cairo and Shanghai (to name just four cities) than there are Jews on earth.

When we commemorate Yom Hashoah v'Hagvurah and we recall the Jews who once lived in Europe, let us also recall the obligations we have to one another today. – MBD

Shuls increase accessibilty for Shabbat Itanu

By JENNIFER M. MACLEOD
Special to the CJN

Look around this Shabbat. Who's missing from your synagogue? And what's keeping them away?

Maybe it's a physical or developmental disability. Maybe they can't hear the service as well as they used to. Maybe they worry that their special-needs child will be stared at, or won't make friends. Maybe they fear that a few steps up to the bimah will mean defeat; a lost opportunity to participate.

On April 17, synagogues around the GTA will work to increase accessibility by observing Toronto's second annual Shabbat Itanu: a Shabbat of inclusion.

"Itanu means 'with us' and the intent is that we're all together," says Fay Rotman of Itanu Toronto, the inclusion initiative of UJA Federation.

To prepare for Shabbat Itanu, Beth Sholom Synagogue will be ensuring that participants in wheelchairs can reach their mezuzah with a Lowering the Mezuzah ceremony, which will take place before the inclusive Shabbat.

The rabbi's sermon that week will also deal with inclusiveness.

For Andrea Spindel, chair of diversity at Darchei Noam Reconstructionist Synagogue of Toronto, inclusion is "a big piece of what we stand for" as part of the Reconstructionist movement, she says.

"People with disabilities are one of the groups we try to include."

With an almost brand-new building, Darchei Noam is ahead of other congregations that may have heavy entrance doors and fixed theatre seating.

The Darchei Noam sanctuary was designed with no permanent benches, which makes it easier for those with physical disabilities to get around.

"It's all chairs... things can always be moved."

Kenny Wise, chair of Beth Sholom's greening and inclusion committee, says their challenge is greater.

"The building's old, to be honest," he says. "We have a temporary ramp for people to get up on the bimah," but the cost of a permanent ramp and other accommodations is prohibitive.

According to Wise, the shul is doing everything they can to increase inclusion.

"We have large siddurims for people who are visually impaired. We're working toward- getting a sound system for the hearing impaired," he says.

"These are not luxuries for a synagogue... I think these are necessities."

At Beth Sholom last year, a developmentally delayed man from a nearby Reena group home was honoured with an aliyah. Since then, says Andrea Rowan, program and youth director, five or six residents have been attending regularly.

"They wanted to come but weren't always fully comfortable."

Inclusion isn't just a nicety; in Ontario, it will soon be the law.

As of January 2012, all organizations must comply with the province of Ontario's accessibility standards for customer service. Government and other public sector organizations began complying in January 2010.

Standards include accommodating service animals, such as guide dogs, and providing seating for individuals who have difficulty waiting in line for extended periods.

To help synagogues begin planning for Shabbat Itanu and long-term inclusiveness, Itanu Toronto held a workshop in December at which Reena, an organization that works with those with developmental handicaps, launched its new brochure, called Breaking Down Barriers: A Guide to Synagogue Accessibility.

Synagogues may be required to provide assistance in the form of magnifying devices, wheelchairs, adequate lighting or captioning. Staff and volunteers should also be trained in meeting both the physical and spiritual needs of all participants. Even if a location is usually accessible, the standards require explicit notification and accommodation during service disruptions, of an elevator for example.

Spindel, who is also president and CEO of Ontario's March of Dimes, praises Shabbat Itanu as a moment when the entire community can take notice of how it can become more accommodating.

"We aren't all thoughtful all the time," she says. "Shabbat Itanu is an opportunity to stop and think."

Rotman agrees.

"The synagogues really are committed to doing the right thing," she says, adding that it's hard to know how many Jews in Toronto are affected by a disability.

Rotman estimates that around 20,000 people might require accommodations.

Along with Darchei Noam and Beth Sholom, the synagogues participating in Shabbat Itanu are: Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, Temple Sinai Congregation of Toronto, Beth Torah Congregation and Shaarei Beth El Synagogue of Oakville. Others may be holding an inclusion Shabbat on another date. Beth Tikvah Synagogue, for example, will hold a special, closed-captioned service on April 10.

Rotman encourages everybody to ask how their synagogue is honouring Shabbat Itanu, which launches the community's third annual Inclusion Action Week April 16 to 22. The week will culminate in an awards ceremony honouring those who have contributed to the inclusion of people with disabilities.

Though Shabbat Itanu "focuses the community's attention," Rotman hopes participants "will continue coming and feel welcome and included... we want it be something that keeps on going for the rest of the year."

Shabbat Itanu may be a special day, says Rotman, but "we don't want it to be just that one day."

Adath Israel's rabbi emeritus celebrates 90th birthday

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

"Basically, age is not a disease," said Rabbi Erwin Schild, who celebrated his 90th birthday March 9 with family, and again at Adath Israel Congregation, where he is rabbi emeritus, on a recent Shabbat.

On the second occasion, he shared with congregants his thoughts on aging, as expressed in a 1982 sermon that appears in the first of his three books, World Through My Window.

"We must live each day fully, not as if it was our last, but as if it was our only one," the rabbi reaffirmed.

Referring to a sermon he gave 10 years ago for his 80th birthday, Rabbi Schild said that people who "can still grow and change" remain young regardless of their chronological age.

Sixty-three years after becoming Adath Israel's spiritual leader, Rabbi Schild can still be found most days in his study at the shul, which has grown to some 1,700 families from less than 200 when he started there.

Rabbi Erwin Schild
[Frances Kraft photo]

He still gives sermons on occasion and officiates at some life cycle events.

"Unfortunately, mostly funerals," he added wryly.

As well, he teaches a weekly text-based study group that he calls Eclectic Torah.

"I enjoy that very much," said the rabbi, who has also led more than 30 trips to Israel.

Last winter, in December 2008, Rabbi Schild experienced a setback when he fell on the ice, fracturing his left hip and shoulder. He credits his recovery – which, he noted, "amazed some people" – in part to the fact that he was a jogger from the late 1950s until five years ago, when he switched to walking for exercise.

"We shouldn't say that certain things are inevitable. A lot depends on your mental attitude," he told The CJN.

The rabbi said he still can't identify "as an aged person. If I sit on a bus or subway and I see an elderly person, I get up and offer my seat, and I'm always surprised if somebody gets up for me.

"You have to live for others," Rabbi Schild said. "You have to try to – it sounds trite – to make the world a better place."

His own efforts in that regard include a long history of interfaith work, both locally and abroad.

A regular visitor to Germany following an initial invitation in 1982, Rabbi Schild has spoken to many Christian groups there about Judaism and his own personal history.

A native of Cologne, the future rabbi was imprisoned briefly in Dachau in 1938 before going to Britain on a student visa and later entering Canada as an enemy alien. He spent two years in an internment camp before starting yeshiva studies in Toronto.

Rabbi Schild is a member of the Order of Canada, and received a similar honour from the German government in 2000, in recognition of his contributions to Jewish-Christian dialogue in Germany.

He said he would probably return to Germany this year or next, but recently turned down three invitations to speak there. Instead, he and his wife will attend two family bar mitzvahs: their great-grandson's and their great-great-nephew's.

"I held this to be more important," he said.

In his own family, in addition to the Conservative Judaism the rabbi represents, there is a "very Orthodox" branch, as well as a Reconstructionist one.

"The resurgence of Orthodoxy has helped the entire community remain true to our tradition," Rabbi Schild said. "Even the liberal movements are influenced by the resurgence of strictly halachic Judaism."

However, he warned of the "danger of Judaism splitting into sects" and eventually no longer being able to form a community. He attributes the risk partly to "the exclusivity of some of the Orthodox, and the lack of appreciation, on the part of the liberal Jews, of the necessity that we must remain one people."

Rabbi Schild believes that non-Orthodox denominations shouldn't do anything to create a breach between the Orthodox and non-Orthodox communities.

At the same time, he said, the Orthodox "should realize that many Jews are what they are. They're liberal not because they want to tear down Judaism or diminish it, but they want to maximize it, making it more relevant to their lives. There has to be more mutual recognition that we all have a job to do.

"We should remember that we are still one Jewish people, and our liberalism should not go so far as to alienate them completely."

He noted that the "hardening of the lines, and the erecting of barriers that are difficult to cross" has become significant. A case in point: recently he came across a decade-old contract to sell chametz signed by himself and a local Orthodox rabbi.

"Today it would be almost unthinkable that an Orthodox rabbi and I would be signing the same contract," he said.

The long shadow of eternal remembrance

Last week, Matthew Burrows, an adviser to the U.S. National Intelligence Council, told a foreign press briefing in Washington, D.C., that American intelligence agencies "continue to assess that Iran has a scientific, technical and industrial capacity to produce enough highly enriched uranium for a weapon in the next few years if it chooses to do so, and eventually to produce nuclear weapons. The central issue is a decision to do so."

American intelligence estimates have not always proven to be especially reliable in the past. Thus, if Burrows was attempting to assuage Israeli and international anxieties regarding the imminence of an Iranian nuclear bomb with his vague assessment of "next few years," he failed to do so.

U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, who repeatedly told her AIPAC audience last month that a nuclear-armed Iran would be "unacceptable," also failed to do so, for she prescribed no program of effective prevention.

Even news last week that six world powers – United States, Russia, Britain, Germany and France, and for the first time China – agreed to pursue a new round of sanctions against Iran, failed to do so. For it is widely known that China will likely only agree to relatively weak sanctions, and even then, not before three or more months have passed.

Two new nuclear plants will soon be under construction in Iran, adding to Tehran's complex network of underground, well-protected nuclear installations. Even the International Atomic Energy Agency now believes that Iran is trying to acquire nuclear weapons. It announced last week that Iran is building another uranium enrichment facility.

Without sounding like Cassandra screaming her alarms into the wind, it is nearly impossible not to pause with shivering disquiet at the prospect of nuclear weapons in the hands of the regime that bankrolls and trains its sadistic cadre of terrorist surrogates and openly yearns for Israel to be "wiped off the map."

It was 65 years ago, after the gates to the various killing and concentration camps in Europe were thrown open, that the world saw the full horrible and horrific truth of Nazi Germany's genocidal wartime objectives. Not a few commentators have drawn the parallel between the failure of the world's democracies to stand up to the Nazis in the mid-1930s and the failure of the world's democracies to stand up to Iran today.

Next week, we commemorate Yom Hashoah v'Hagvurah. The destruction of European Jewry casts a very long, dark shadow of eternal remembrance with very clear imperatives. That shadow did not only fall upon the Jewish people. It fell upon the entire world. The entire world, therefore, needs to grasp the urgency of those imperatives.

25 years ago in The CJN

U.S. president Ronald Reagan said his refusal to visit the Dachau concentration camp on an upcoming trip to Germany to mark 40 years since the Nazis' defeat didn't mean the Holocaust should be forgotten. He said memorial events should be a celebration and not "for reawakening memories of the war." He said Germans have had "a guilt feeling imposed on them" and few were alive who had taken part in the war.

Get abuse is abuse against women

I was so pleased to see the article "'One agunah is too many,' despite changes in law, 'the problem persists'" (March 18), as get abuse is another type of abuse against women that is not recognized as such in the majority of cases. Education is always the key factor in creating change.

Two years ago, Jewish Women International of Canada (JWIC) participated in a project to produce Family Law Education for Women (FLEW) materials, funded by the Ontario Women's Directorate. JWIC was also asked to produce a "specialty product" for Jewish women. A group of community experts worked on this project for one year, producing Why Do I Need A Jewish Divorce? Questions & Answers for Jewish Women. This excellent and informative booklet is available in English, French, Yiddish, Hebrew, Russian and Spanish free of charge from JWIC. It answers important questions for women, religious or not about the need for a get, the procedure and other details. Contact JWIC at 416-630-9313 or at info@jwic.com.

Shabbat at the ends of the earth

The reopening of the Israeli Embassy in New Zealand is a fortuitous development that will strengthen world Jewry (The News in Brief, March 18).

Jews who will be moving to New Zealand in order to staff and support the embassy are halachically obligated to observe two consecutive days of Shabbat every week and two consecutive days of Yom Kippur every year, owing to the insoluble doubt regarding the longitudinal position of the international dateline, as it is defined by Torah law. A detailed legal analysis of why this is so is published in an article co-authored by Rabbi Moshe Ashen and myself that appears in Yeshiva University's journal Beit Yitzchak (www.yutorah.org).

The duty to observe two consecutive days of Shabbat in New Zealand sheds homiletical light on the verse "May God bless us, and may all the ends of the earth fear Him" (Psalms 67:8). Namely, Jews living at the ends of the earth (in such locations as New Zealand), where it is not halachically clear whether they inhabit the far east or the far west, are summoned to manifest fear of God by observing two consecutive days of Shabbat.

Jewish life flourishing in Kingston

As president of Queen's Hillel, allow me to congratulate the Kappa Phi Chapter of the AEPi fraternity on their recent chartering ("Kingston fraternity comes of age," March 18). I would also like to assure your readers that there are other aspects to the flourishing Jewish life in Kingston.

Queen's Hillel is the second-oldest Hillel in Canada, founded some 65 years ago. Since then, we have grown into a thriving hub of Jewish life. With many cultural, religious, educational, and philanthropic events for our nearly 200 members, we provide a welcoming community for Jewish students of all backgrounds while they are away from home.

We also work together with the other Jewish organizations in Kingston, such as the Kingston Jewish Council, Beth Israel Synagogue and Iyr Hamelech Congregation, as well as AEPi. Hillel and AEPi are not mutually exclusive alternatives to one another. Rather, we complement each other. We have been successful at building a co-operative, positive relationship, recently partnering on a Gift of Life bone marrow registry clinic where we entered 410 new names.

AEPi is a wonderful addition to the Kingston Jewish family. While we are sure that incoming Jewish students will benefit from all the hard work these young men do, the other elements of the dynamic Jewish community at Queen's should not be ignored.

I am researching my mother's family. Her father, Woolf Brodie, came out to Toronto from Manchester, England, in 1923 to stay with his sister, Leah (formerly Brodie). 'Hitler did not win'

By ELI RUBENSTEIN

A well-known story from the Holocaust is told by Primo Levi in Survival in Auschwitz.

Shortly after Levi first arrived in Auschwitz, he saw an icicle hanging from one of the barracks. Attempting to relieve his parched throat, Levi reached for the icicle only to have it snatched away by a Nazi guard.

"Why?" the naïve Levi asked the guard, yet unfamiliar with the alien rules of "Planet Auschwitz."

The guard responded bluntly: "There is no why here."

There is no "why" in Auschwitz.

This simple story illustrates the grim reality of a universe created primarily for the purpose of causing human suffering, and ultimately murder, where rules existed for the sole reason of crushing the human spirit, and where this cruel intention was made amply known to the prisoners.

Over the years, Auschwitz has been "elevated" to the symbol of human evil. The wedding of technology and murder, the staggering number of victims, the infamous moment of selection by "Dr." Josef Mengele, the "Angel of Death," the eyewitness testimonies of so many survivors, have all contributed to Auschwitz's representing the deepest abyss to which humanity can plunge.

And yet, communities around the world, as far away as Australia, have been sending thousands of young people on visits to this darkest of places, on programs like the March of the Living (for Jewish students) and the March of Remembrance and Hope (for multifaith students).

Why?

The reasons are both universal and specific, and too complex to be adequately described here.

Nevertheless, a few general reflections are worth noting.

On a universal level, Auschwitz reminds us of what the thin veneer we call "civilization" really masks, and how easy it is for societies – "advanced" or not – to slip into genocidal behavior. It has been said that after Auschwitz, we can no longer be naïve about the dark side of humanity. So too, can one no longer remain oblivious to the human capacity for evil, after a visit to Auschwitz.

Human rights education, the dignity of all humanity, the infinite preciousness of each life, what Jewish tradition calls "Tzelem Elokim" – there is no greater, more tragic reminder of the need for the inculcation of these values than a visit to a site of mass murder such as Auschwitz.

Since the Holocaust, there has been no shortage of genocides. Need I mention Rwanda, Cambodia and the ongoing tragedy in Darfur? Perhaps these calamities could have been averted if children there and throughout the world were raised within educational systems that proclaimed a love and compassion for humanity at the core of its purpose. Perhaps there would have been no perpetrators or no bystanders – or more realistically, fewer of each.

From a specifically Jewish perspective, the purpose and lessons of a visit to Auschwitz and other Holocaust sites in Poland, followed by a visit to Israel, touch upon personal, theological, cultural, political and other areas, too important and numerous to adequately address here.

But there are two areas I would like to dwell upon.

One area concerns the idea of pilgrimage. On the March of the Living, young people transport themselves thousands of miles away from their homes, and with their own two feet, tread upon the very earth where our ancestors learned, prayed, loved – and perished. This act of travelling to these former places of life and learning, and destruction and martyrdom, is in itself a cry of protest over the injustices of the past. It is an act of sacred memorialization, a statement to the entire world – and perhaps even to those who have perished – that the death of six million of our people and so many others will never be forgotten.

The students are not just learning about history, but with their physical presence they are touching and indeed entering history, making a statement, with their entire being in the present, about the past.

Sally Wasserman, a Holocaust survivor and hidden child, recalled one moment from all her trips to Poland that still stands out for her. She and her students had visited a charming town called Tykcohen, a shtetl right out of Fiddler on the Roof. The lovingly restored small synagogue in the village square, dating back to 1642, was a reminder of the traditional way of life that once thrived there. Then the group left the idyllic town for the nearby Lopohova forest, where Tykcohen's Jews were marched, ordered to dig pits, then shot en masse into the graves they had been forced to prepare for themselves. Silence engulfed the students standing at this sombre site of grievous carnage. "You know I'm not a religious person," Sally recalled, "but I couldn't help myself."

I shouted out, "Please, please, someone say Kaddish! Please!"

And Kaddish was indeed recited in the middle of the lush, green forest that hid this terrible crime – and all the children answered, "Amen."

Why do we return? To say: "We are here, and with all our might and all our strength, we proclaim on this very ground, with our bodies and our souls: We remember, we shall always remember!" And to answer, "Amen" when Kaddish is recited in the memory of our martyred ancestors.

The second area concerns the role of the survivors on the trip. The March of the Living has evolved since the trip was first begun in 1988. More attention is now paid to the rich Jewish life that existed in prewar Europe; dialogue between Jewish and Polish Christian students and meetings with the Righteous Among the Nations are encouraged; the revival of the Jewish community in Poland is discussed. But the single most significant change has been with regard to the role of the survivor.

It's hard to believe, but Holocaust survivors did not join the March of the Living in its earliest years. Now, they are seen as indispensible to the program. Each bus on this year's March of the Living, comprised of some 30 countries, will include at least one survivor who will share his or her painful Holocaust stories with the students in the very places they unfolded.

Over the years, thousands of stories have been transmitted by survivors to students travelling to Poland – standing near the dome of ashes in Majdanek, or in a barrack in Auschwitz, or among the silent stone monuments in Treblinka. Each story is more heartbreaking than the next, each a story of life and love interrupted, of irreparable loss.

Who can forget Pinchas Gutter telling of the last time he saw his twin sister in Majdanek? All he can remember is the long golden blond braid swinging behind her back, as she was herded with their mother toward her end – but he cannot to this day, try as he might, recall her face.

And how can anyone forget Judy Weissenberg Cohen telling of the last time she saw her mother, during the selection on the train tracks in Birkenau, and how, to this day, she still wishes she had given her mother one last hug and kiss goodbye.

Which student could ever forget Anita Ekstein, whose life was saved by righteous Poles, visiting Belzec on, of all days, Mother's Day, and finding her mother's name on the memorial wall in Belzec; or the recounting of her father's last words to her, at eight years of age, which were: "Always remember who you are."

And yet, in the survivors' act of telling, of transmitting their memories to a new generation, a seed of hope is planted anew. By embarking on these trips, the young people are, in effect, pledging: "Your struggles will be remembered, your loved ones will not be forgotten. We, a new generation of young people, commit to creating a better world for the Jewish People, and for all humanity, a world far different than the one that sought to destroy your generation."

We who were born in the post-Holocaust era have inherited a broken world.

But as we study this broken world of ours and then look at the earnest faces of our young people, who so much want to understand and to not repeat the mistakes of the past, we are reminded of what Rabbi Nachman of Breslev taught us some two centuries ago: "If you believe it can be broken, then know it can also be fixed."

Hitler attempted not only to destroy the Jewish People, but to spiritually break them in the process. To reduce them from individuals, to numbers, and then to ash, to destroy the very memory of every Jewish woman, man and child.

Each time we return to Poland, each time a Holocaust survivor shares his or her story of survival, we are denying Hitler's aims. Each time a survivor shares the story of his or her martyred relatives, we are lifting them out from their anonymous deaths and denying Hitler a posthumous victory. Each time a group of young people arrives in Auschwitz and proclaims the values of human dignity and equality, we know our broken world can yet again be made whole.

Let me share one last moment from the March of the Living.

Looking out on the sea of humanity, upon thousands of young people from around the world wearing blue and white jackets, marching from Auschwitz to Birkenau on Yom Hashoah, Anita Ekstein told her daughter, Ruth: "You see? Hitler did not win."

Our Holocaust survivors and our young people have banded together to remind the world of the terrible wave of hatred that once engulfed it, and how we must strive to set a new course for humanity, one that embraces love, dignity, and empathy for each and every member of the human family.

Their legacy is our hope.

Eli Rubenstein is national director of the March of the Living and director of education for the March of Remembrance and Hope. Together with 10,000 young people from around the world, and more than 600 Canadian participants, students, survivors and adults from Canada, he will be marching on Yom Hashoah from Auschwitz to Birkenau on the 2010 March of the Living.

Until the last breath

In times of oppression, it feels as if we don't have free will. If someone is holding a gun to your head, what choices do you have?

But there is free will in hell. Even when he's lost control of his fate, man can choose quiet nobility.

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

It's easy to ignore these fragments of free will. Choices seem insignificant when the outcome is inevitable. When the Romans executed the great Rabbi Akiva, his students stood by during his last moments. As the Romans were torturously tearing Rabbi Akiva's skin off, the time for the Shema arrived. Weakened and dazed, Rabbi Akiva recited the prayer. His startled students exclaimed: "Rebbe, even now?" Do you still need to say the Shema seconds before death, when you have already proven your courage?

The students' amazement is understandable, but Rabbi Akiva's lesson is a significant one: there's still free will in hell.

Free will remains, even when death is inevitable, because we can choose how we live our last moments. To spend one's last seconds whispering a prayer may seem insignificant, but actually, this whispered prayer is a heroic declaration that our final choices matter. (Indeed, Rabbi Akiva's Shema has been emulated ever since.) Rabbi Akiva reminds us that free will is possible everywhere, even in hell.

Of course, free will under duress is precious. Victor Frankl, a psychiatrist and Holocaust survivor, wrote a book about his experiences entitled Man's Search for Meaning. He relates that even though many were dehumanized by the concentration camps, some inspirational people rose above their circumstances.

He writes: "We who lived in concentration camps can remember the men who walked through the huts comforting others, giving away their last piece of bread. They may have been few in number, but they offer sufficient proof that everything can be taken from a man but one thing: the last of the human freedoms – to choose one's attitude in any given set of circumstances, to choose one's own way."

Yes, it's normal for a person who has been degraded to believe that he's an animal. But man's free will shines its brightest in crises – when people courageously choose to recite the Shema in their dying moments and heroically choose to share their rations in a concentration camp. Man always has a choice.

It may seem absurd to stand before the angel of death and still worry about mumbling a prayer or giving away a half eaten crust of bread. But in actuality, these small choices affirm man's invincible spirit, a spirit as infinite as the image of God.

And that invincible spirit remains with us, until the last breath.

Anti-Israel week elicits yawning, not yelling

On Feb. 25, the Ontario legislature unanimously passed, by voice vote, a resolution condemning "Israeli Apartheid Week" (IAW), days before it began in Toronto, as well in 11 other Canadian cities and another two dozen locations worldwide.

Gil Troy in Montreal

This all-party amity on any issue is rare. Just as the Obama Administration was gearing up for an unnecessary, counterproductive showdown with Israel, Canada once again took the lead in supporting it.

MPP Peter Shurman, should be hailed for leading the fight against what he branded a "hateful… odious" comparison that insults Israel, all democratic countries that share Israel's values, and millions of black South Africans who endured racism under apartheid, which separated people on the basis of colour systematically, legally and brutally.

Shurman's resolution proclaimed: "I move that in the opinion of this house, the term 'Israeli Apartheid Week' is condemned, as it serves to incite hatred against Israel, a democratic state that respects the rule of law and human rights, and the use of the word 'apartheid' in this context diminishes the suffering of those who were victims of a true apartheid regime in South Africa."

Shurman understood that these resolutions are not binding. Moreover, they do not squelch anyone's right to free speech, no matter how aggressive or untrue that speech may be. Rather, he explained, the resolution was a tool of "moral suasion," reflecting the feelings of a democratic body, appalled by an unreasonable, undemocratic assault against the democratic nation of Israel.

By contrast, in a video circulated on the Internet promoting the bash-Israel-fest, Toronto-based activist Naomi Klein proclaimed: "Nothing about this week is motivated by hate. It's motivated by justice. It's about using our freedom to defend the freedom of Palestinians to exist in peace and dignity and with full equality in their land."

In fact, Palestinian nationalism's great failure is its nihilism, the fact that so much of the movement's energies are dedicated to destroying Israel rather than building a Palestinian state. A week celebrating Palestinian nationalism could be about "peace and dignity." But a week demonizing Israel and celebrating the false, misleading comparison with South African racism is about hate – and, not surprisingly, has often degenerated into hooliganism and anti-Semitism.

There is much to debate regarding Israel, Palestinians and the quest for Middle East peace. But someone committed to "peace and dignity" would acknowledge how much of this constant Israel-bashing is fed by the crudest Arab anti-Semitism. The disgusting images rooted in Nazi propaganda that still appear in the Arab press feed a demonizing discourse that led some York University students to yell "die Jew" and recently led a student at Oxford University protesting an Israeli government official to yell in Arabic "Itbah al-Yahud," which means "Slaughter the Jews."

Nationalism is a double-edged sword: it can elevate and enlighten, as it does in democracies such as Canada, or it can rouse and ruin. Becoming addicted to hatred of one's defined adversaries gives a fleeting feeling of unity, but it ultimately degenerates into violence and destructiveness. Too much of the Palestinian national movement – and far too much of it on campus and in North America – is devoted to Israel-bashing. It creates a culture of martyrdom that celebrates suicide bombers rather than nation builders. It honours leaders such as Yasser Arafat, who preferred the purity of perpetual violence to the complexity of compromise. It results, in a cult of violence, sometimes feeding Hamas-versus-Fatah bloodshed, usually aimed at Jews.

Too much of the Arab world seems engulfed by this irrational hatred of Israel and Zionism. That this hatred is perfumed, rationalized and masked on campus in the language of human rights, then ennobled with the sacred mantle of the anti-apartheid struggle, is perverse.

Fortunately, most of our students are too smart to be swayed by such distortions. Initial reports this year suggest that "anti-Israel week" 2010 was a bust.

Students repudiated this festival of historical distortion, nationalist nihilism and Israel-bashing by yawning, not yelling. Most demonstrated the good sense to avoid the tumult and let the haters shout to mostly empty rooms – a perfect response.

Let's bring a little bit of Jerusalem to T.O.

Recently a friend of ours here in Jerusalem remarked, "When I arrived in Jerusalem, I had a master's degree in Jewish studies from Brandeis University. I soon realized that was barely the equivalent of a high school diploma here." How true! Although certainly not all Israelis are Einsteins, and in fact there are many ignoramuses, in a society where you can often be taught some Torah from a cab driver, or a snippet of Maimonides from your plumber, it can be pretty intimidating.

Rabbi Elyse Goldstein in Jerusalem

I'm in awe at the depth of learning and erudition in Jerusalem, where the competition to teach and to learn is stiff. Fabulous days of learning happen all over the city before every festival, drawing interested, curious and passionate students from across both the religious and non-religious spectrum. Any night of the week offers you a chance to learn with another "big name" speaker. These speakers sometimes go on "speaking tours" that hit Toronto, and we get the opportunity to hear them once a year if we're lucky. Here, you can attend their shiur weekly. Great yeshivas are a dime a dozen, and great teachers a nickel a dozen.

By great teachers, I don't mean teachers who are all charisma and little content; who tell the students what the text means without giving them a chance to unpack it themselves, or who teach other people's "stock" curriculum. They may be great teachers in that they're funny, entertaining, provocative and make difficult material easy to digest. But what I mean is truly great scholars who have encyclopedic knowledge and offer novel and startling insights, not the same old reheated rabbinic clichés.

They don't "dumb down" the material or interpret it using their own personal agenda. They expect students to reach up, to struggle with a difficult passage, to read the commentaries, and to go home and explore further (and not on Wikipedia, either). They admit when a text is confusing, contradictory, emotionally charged or even bizarre, and they wrestle with it even when it doesn't "sit right" with a student at the end. I've learned as much from simply watching these methodical, brilliant teachers as I have from the material itself.

We have an amazing community and talented, first-rate scholars in Toronto, but I worry that we do not "reach in" and "reach up" enough. We should and must continue all our efforts to bring into the fold those on the margins – the unengaged, the peripheral. We should and must offer innovative and creative opportunities to start a Jewish journey. But what about those who are already well on the path, literate in Jewish texts and involved in Jewish life, those who have studied all the "basics" and want to move deeper, faster, higher?

I envision opportunities for advanced students to study on a higher level than most "basics" we already have, especially in liberal settings. I envision more Limmud-type days, evening and weekends where people learn in the same room with folks from very different backgrounds and viewpoints. I envision a beit midrash where men and women from across the Jewish spectrum could just "drop in," find a study partner (who might not be from the same shul or even denomination as they are) and a teacher. I envision people learning biblical Hebrew as well as the beginner's alephbet. I guess I envision a little bit of Jerusalem in Toronto.

At the beginning of May is Lag b'Omer, marking the end of a plague upon Rabbi Akiva's students. Most people know it as a holiday of bonfires, but during the Middle Ages, Lag b'Omer became a special holiday for rabbinical students and was called the "Scholar's Festival." As such, it symbolizes the Jewish determination to learn, and the Jewish passion to teach. How wonderful if Toronto would lead the way in being a Diaspora Jewish scholar's town.

The Kirshner File

Iran's quest for nuclear arms may touch off a war

Iran's war of words with Israel, spurred by Israel's extremely strong suspicion that Iran is building a nuclear arsenal despite its insistent denials, has reached new rhetorical heights of brinkmanship lately.

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad recently taunted Israel, boasting that neither the Israeli government nor the western powers can do "a damn thing" to stop Iran's budding nuclear program. Ahmadinejad, who has repeatedly called for Israel's destruction, warned Israel it would be finished off "once and for all" if it launched a preemptive attack on Iran's nuclear sites. Iran's foreign minister, Manchour Mottaki, added that while Israel – "a crazy country run by crazy people" – is militarily in no position to strike Iran, "we must prepare for the chance that Israel will do something crazy."

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

The question that consumes the Middle East these days is whether Israel will eventually act on its oft-stated belief that a nuclear-armed Iran is an intolerant danger to its very existence.

Prior to his election last year as Israel's prime minister, Benjamin Netanyahu described Iran's nuclear program as "an existential threat [to] Israel" and said, "I promise that if I am elected, Iran will not acquire nuclear arms." After taking office, Netanyahu suggested that his foremost task was "to eliminate the danger" emanating from Iran. "Who will eliminate it? It is us or no one." Netanyahu's national security adviser, Uzi Arad, reiterated that Israel would not allow Iran to attain nuclear weapons capability.

Neither Netanyahu nor Arad were staking out a new policy. Five years ago, Israel's then defence minister, Shaul Mofaz, said, "Under no circumstances would Israel be able to tolerate nuclear weapons in Iranian possession." Israel's former chief of staff, Dan Halutz, was just as emphatic. Asked how far Israel was ready to go to stop Iran, he replied, "Two thousand kilometres."

Since then, Iran has made considerable strides to attain an atomic bomb, notwithstanding a comment by its supreme leader, Ayatollah Khamenei, that Iran is not seeking nuclear weapons and is only interested in developing nuclear energy for peaceful purposes.

Last month, shortly after Tehran approved plans to build 10 industrial scale uranium enrichment plants, Ahmadinejad announced that Iran was close to enriching uranium to more than 80 per cent purity, the level required for a nuclear device.

This came on the heels of a report by the International Atomic Energy Agency that Iran may currently be working on ways to convert enriched uranium into a nuclear warhead.

Israeli officials are absolutely convinced that Iran wants a nuclear arsenal and is on the brink of joining the exclusive nuclear club, of which Israel is a member.

"Iran will not abandon [its] nuclear program," said Vice-Premier Silvan Shalom last autumn. Israel's chief of military intelligence, Amos Yadlin, claims that Iran has accumulated enough materials to manufacture a bomb. Yossi Baidatz, the head of Yadlin's research division, says that Iran has the technical knowledge to outfit a missle fitted with a nuclear device that can reach Israel.

Meir Dagan, the director of the Mossad, has said that Iran will be ready to launch a nuclear weapon by 2014. A study published by the Institute for National Security at Tel Aviv University concludes that Iran could be a year away from producing a nuclear weapon. "Politically, however, Iran may choose a later date to do this," says its co-author, Ephraim Kam.

The former director of the International Atomic Energy Agency, Mohammed El Baradei, claimed that Iran's pursuit of a bomb is a function of its desire to be recognized as a major power in the Middle East and serves as an "insurance policy" to ward off possible threats to its sovereignty.

There is an element of truth in his assertion, but it is also true that a nuclear-armed Iran would embolden Tehran and its allies – Hezbollah and Hamas – and thereby create more uncertainty and instability in the region.

An Iranian nuclear arsenal could also have a disastrous and demoralizing effect on Israelis. According to the Center for Iranian Studies at Tel Aviv University, 23 per cent of Israelis would consider leaving the country if Iran acquired a nuclear device.

Having considered this scenario, Israel's former deputy defence minister, Ephraim Sneh, said, "We cannot live under the shadow of an Iran with nuclear weapons."

So what is the solution?

The former director of the Mossad, Danny Yatom, put it bluntly: Iran's quest for nuclear arms can only be stopped by military means. Israel's current defence minister, Ehud Barak, is more circumspect: Israel is not "taking any option off the table." Its deputy foreign minister, Danny Ayalon, has been clearer: Israel has not given up the option of a military response.

Last summer, however, Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman said, "Israel is not planning to bomb Iran," while President Shimon Peres said, "Israel does not plan to launch any strikes on Iran. We are a peaceful country and we will not do this." More recently, following claims by Iran that Israel is planning "a spring or summer war," Netanyahu discounted such speculation. But last September, he refused to rule out the possibility of an Israeli strike on Iran.

For now, Israel is focused on fostering support for a fourth set of United Nations sanctions against Iran. "I believe now is the time for diplomacy," said Barak. Netanyahu was more specific: "This means not moderate sanctions or watered-down sanctions, this means crippling sanctions." Israel has thus urged Russia and China – which have both been wary of imposing tough sanctions on Iran – to turn a new page. In addition, Israel supported a U.S.-backed plan to curb Iran's nuclear program through shipments of its enriched uranium abroad.

If Israel attacks Iran's nuclear sites, the burden would fall on Israeli aircraft such as these.

But since Iran's leadership ultimately rejected this plan, and since sanctions may not deter Iran, Israel may seriously consider a military response. The passage of two Sa'ar 5-class Israeli Navy ships through the Suez Canal last July, as well as Israel's more recent unveiling of a long-range drone capable of carrying a variety of payloads for thousands of kilometres, were interpreted as implicit messages to Iran that Israel may be preparing for unilateral action in the near future.

If Israel were to attack Iran, the Israeli Air Force would probably be called upon to carry out the mission. The main targets would presumably be Iran's nuclear research centre in Isfahan, the uranium-enrichment facility in Natanz, the heavy water factory in Arak and perhaps the reactor in Bushehr.

An Israeli bombing campaign would be "a complex and high-risk" venture, lacking "any assurances that the overall mission [would] have a high success rate," write Anthony Cordesman and Abdullah Toukan of the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington, D.C., citing Iran's fortified and dispersed underground facilities and its formidable anti-aircraft defences. Besides, Iran may well have built secret sites.

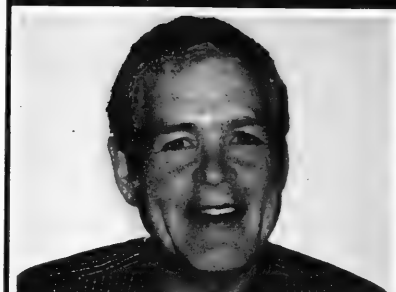
At best, Israel may succeed in damaging Iran's nuclear infrastructure, leaving the problem fundamentally unresolved and itself open to Iranian retaliation. By way of reprisal, Iran's minister of defence has threatened to bomb Israel's nuclear installations, while the leader of its Revolutionary Guards has promised to "blow up the heart" of Israel.

Clearly, a war with Iran would be prolonged and very costly to Israel, as Israeli researcher Moshe Vered has written. In other words, it may be counterproductive.

Finally, the United States, Israel's sole ally, is opposed to a military strike, as a parade of American visitors from the vice-president to the director of the CIA have informed Israel of late in no uncertain terms.

At the end of the day, as NATO's former secretary-general, Jaap de Hoop Scheffer, has noted, Israel may have no choice but to learn to live with a nuclear-armed Iran. For Israel, this would be a bitter pill to swallow.

Romspen is the best financial decision I have ever made.



I am wary of investment tips. I have lost money on many. But investing with Romspen is absolutely the best investment decision I ever made. In fact, I have reinvested many times over the years.

Don't confuse Romspen with the scammers. Romspen is not too good to be true. It is a fund of first mortgages in Canada that is managed by experienced and fine people. It works because they know what they are doing. Their excellent reputation with both investors and borrowers is well deserved.

Pride of Israel rabbi preps for U.S. Navy deployment

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Until recently, Rabbi Sean Gorman's commission with the United States Navy hasn't impinged much on his duties as a spiritual leader in Toronto.

This fall, however, he will be deployed as a battalion chaplain after Sukkot.

Following two months of preparation in Mississippi, the rabbi's unit, Naval Mobile Construction Battalion 26, will travel to the CENTCOM region, which includes Afghanistan, Iran, Iraq and Kuwait. He expects to return in August 2011.

Rabbi Sean Gorman

A native of Brooklyn, N.Y., who attended junior high and high school in Norfolk, Va., Rabbi Gorman – a self-described "navy brat" whose father was a boiler technician – arrived in Toronto in 2005 to serve as the third rabbi of Beth Tzedec Congregation. Last summer, he became the rabbi of the Pride of Israel Synagogue.

Ordained by the Conservative movement's Jewish Theological Seminary in 1998, Rabbi Gorman trained as a navy chaplain while still a rabbinical student. "It was something I thought was very important."

Rabbi Gorman announced the upcoming deployment – his first – to his new congregation in last month's synagogue bulletin. "The reaction has been supportive," he told The CJN.

While other types of support – such as care packages – are "vitally important," it's "a much more emphatic statement" for a congregation to send its rabbi, he said.

Until recently, Rabbi Gorman's navy commitment was two days a month and two weeks a year of service.

The rabbi's preparation at the moment, aside from two weeks of training, involves "mostly logistical stuff, such as making sure the cars get tires."

His wife, Rabbi Jennifer Gorman who is regional youth director for Eastern Canadian Region United Synagogue Youth (ECRUSY) and congregational consultant for United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism – does not have an official role at the Pride of Israel. She will remain here with their three children.

As chaplain for people of all faiths, Rabbi Gorman will address the religious and spiritual needs on both an individual and unit level, act as a counsellor when necessary, and "be a smiling face at all times," he wrote to his congregants.

He added that an enlisted man will be assigned to him to make sure he always has his religious gear, and to be his bodyguard in the field.

Although he can only run religious services for Jewish personnel, he will ensure that trained lay leaders are available for other faith groups.

The rabbi estimates there will only be about half a dozen Jews in his 600-strong battalion.

Rabbi Gorman said he is excited about his deployment. His battalion – one of the construction battalions (CBs), also known as SeaBees – consists of builders. The rabbi expects that they may build a hospital or school.

"It's got to be something along those lines," he said. "We are not a strike force."

Although he doesn't expect to be in a combat situation, he said the battalion is prepared for that possibility.

UJA Walk with Israel 2010 to benefit the children of Bat Yam

42nd annual event takes to the streets of Toronto on Sunday, May 30th

By Daniel Horowitz

It's hard to believe, but United Jewish Appeal's annual Walk with Israel is about to turn 42, and will again turn the streets of Toronto into a veritable sea of blue and white on Sunday, May 30th.

By taking part in this year's event – the largest one-day Israel solidarity walk in the Diaspora – not only will you be showing your support of Israel, you will be helping young children in the city of Bat Yam, with proceeds being allocated through United Israel Appeal Canada to children's projects.

Located just south of Tel Aviv, Bat Yam has been plagued with severe unemployment, poor living conditions and an educational system that faces many challenges. The city is also home to a high population of Ethiopian immigrants striving to integrate into Israeli society.

The Walk kick-off party, held at Coronation Park – across from the CNE's Princes' Gates and sponsored by Horizons Betapro ETFs - will begin at 9am, with the Walk starting at 10am, rain or shine.

This year's Walk will again be chaired by husband and wife team Lianne and Bruce Leboff.

"Our family has two personal connections to Bat Yam, so chairing this year's Walk is even more meaningful to Bruce and I," said Lianne who, along with Bruce and their three daughters Rachel, Stephi and Danielle, have just returned from the Israeli city. "Our twin daughters have just celebrated their bat mitzvah, and one of them is donating her gifts to a sport and dance program for Ethiopian teens at the community centre there. Our other daughter is using her gifts to provide special needs kids in Toronto with a Jewish camp experience."

A portion of funds raised from this year's Walk with Israel will fund children's programs in Bat Yam.

The Leboffs have also been involved with developing Bat Yam's community garden, which gives elders in the Ethiopian community the opportunity to get back to doing what they do so well, working the land. The community garden is supported by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

"We felt that it was important to co-chair the Walk again this year to build on the experiences we gained after last year's event," said Bruce. "We are also delighted to have two outstanding vice chairs in Laurie Sheff and Johnny Cole, both of whom are committed to making this year's walk the best ever. We hope that children and families in Toronto will be inspired to help those in Bat Yam. We just witnessed firsthand the positive effects that the Toronto partnership is providing to the residents of that community."

The title sponsor for this year's Walk with Israel is Metropia Urban Landscapes, a national real estate company devoted to urban development and renewal.

"It was an easy choice for Metropia to sponsor the Walk, which has been a very visible and important part of the GTA's fabric for decades," said Howard Sokolowski, CEO of Metropia. "While the Walk supports important, life-changing initiatives in Israel, it's also a day for families and friends to come together and enjoy all that it has to offer. "

The Walk with Israel ends with the RioCan Festival which starts at 11:30am at The Direct Energy Centre, Exhibition Place, and features carnival rides and games; a petting zoo; Guitar Hero; an Israeli arts and crafts centre; a kosher barbecue; and much more.

Ivey mission gives participants the unbiased truth about Israel

Combining their business savvy with a strong bond to the State of Israel, three students of The Richard Ivey School of Business recently organized a unique experience for several of their classmates.

From February 12 to the 20th, Rebecca Klaczkowski, Aaron Posluns and Tamar Zagdanski - all Ivey Honours in Business Administration students - organized and led two dozen schoolmates, including 19 non-Jews, on a life-changing mission to Israel.

While the mission is an educational and thought-provoking experience in itself, organizers also hope that the non-Jewish participants, many of whom may well become Canadian business and political leaders, will carry a positive view of Israel in the future, based on that experience.

One of those possible future leaders is Steph Zhang, who found her first trip to Israel to be a moving one.

"Despite the magnitude of the conflict in the Middle East, I was so moved by the Israeli people who I spoke to on this trip," she said. "They all have so much hope and optimism for the future. No matter what they have been through, everyone remains hopeful that they will continue to thrive. I loved the people and I loved the country."

"Leading this trip was an educational, inspirational and extremely rewarding experience that I will cherish for the rest of my life," said Posluns. "I am so grateful to all of our donors for the opportunity to take so many of my non-Jewish classmates to a place I treasure so much. We are also grateful to our school, which strongly supports our efforts, and provides all participating students with an academic credit."

Billed as a study trip, mission participants were asked to write a "reflection paper" about their experiences on which they were graded.

The eight-day mission included meetings with a number of high profile business leaders, journalists, politicians, Israeli students, a visit to the Weizmann Institute of Science, and much more.

"Exposure to the business leaders and journalists was very exciting, but the real highlight was connecting with my peers as they reacted to Israel," said Klaczkowski.

"I had a basic level of understanding about the conflict when I came, but now I have a completely different view of the situation in Israel," said Israeli first-timer Chris Selby. "After seeing Israel with my own eyes, I now see that what is portrayed in the media is not actually the full story."

"Bringing 19 non-Jewish Ivey students to Israel to educate them about the culture, heritage and the current economic and political situation, was a very rewarding experience," said Zagdanski. "We were fortunate enough to meet with some of the leading entrepreneurs and venture capitalists in Israel who demonstrated the country's cutting-edge in technology and innovation. It was also gratifying to see so many participants come to the realization that the media portrayal of Israel was biased."

This was the third year of the Ivey Mission to Israel, and organizers hope that with support from the Jewish community, it will continue its important role of building positive relationships within the non-Jewish community in the future.

For Israelis, peace is a necessity, not a 'hobby'

In his March 28 New York Times column, "Hobby or Necessity," Tom Friedman wrote that the recent clash between U.S. President Barack Obama and Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu is not just a disagreement over settlements, but rather reflects what Friedman termed "a tectonic shift" in U.S.-Israel relations.

Still, Friedman justified the dramatic imagery of major structural change underway by arguing that a resolution of the Palestinian-Israeli conflict has become a "necessity" for the United States while it remains a "hobby" for Israelis, thereby implying that U.S. pressure on Israel will continue to mount as it has never done so before.

The "necessity" part of Friedman's article must be left for a future column. For now, what is one to make of his calling Israel's commitment to the peace process a "hobby"? For sure it's a provocative claim. But it's also a false one.

Here's why: Friedman acknowledged that Israel's efforts over the last decade to seriously achieve a breakthrough with the Palestinians came to naught with the "collapse" of the Oslo peace process. Yet he failed to mention the reason it collapsed: former Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat rejected Israel's offer of a viable Palestinian state – the same offer, although Friedman also didn't mention it, that current PA President Mahmoud Abbas rejected under the Annapolis formula just a couple of years ago.

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

The essential point is that the Palestinian refusal to say "yes" to a Palestinian state that entails the recognition of a Jewish state is the cause of Israelis' disillusionment with a "peace" process that has brought Israelis only violence and, ironically, growing international condemnation and isolation when they react in self-defence.

True, Friedman recognized that Israel's unilateral withdrawals from Lebanon (2000) and Gaza (2005) "were followed not by peace, but by rocket attacks by Hezbollah and Hamas on Israel," and that these attacks, together with the failure of negotiations with the Palestinians, "decimated Israel's peace camp."

What he didn't say, however, is that these factors didn't decimate Israel's yearning for peace, only the idea (still widely held in the West) that more talks at this time – with the PA corrupt and weak, with the Palestinians divided between Fatah and Hamas, both of which are hostile to the Jewish character of Israel, and with Iran's growing menace – are likely to be productive.

Friedman, however, confused Israel's well-founded skepticism with complacency, given the country's solid economic performance and freedom from terrorist attacks since the security barrier (although only half completed) went up. In Friedman's view, Israelis are comfortable and feel no urgency to make peace, hence his use of the denigrating term "hobby."

But the validity of using that word to describe Israel is belied by two key facts. First, despite its skepticism, Israel has repeatedly called for negotiations without preconditions. American heavy-handedness over the settlement issue, not Israeli intransigence, has given Abbas and the PA a convenient excuse (so far) to avoid talks – even mediated talks – with the Israelis.

Second, it's fundamentally wrong to imply, as Friedman does, that the onus for peace falls squarely on Israel, since this assumes the Palestinians are willing this time to compromise, including over Jerusalem. There's simply no evidence to support that assumption, and much to contradict it.

(Yes, several Israeli analysts have argued that the current Israeli governing coalition would find it far more difficult to make the same generous offers than previous governments made to Arafat and Abbas. But they also note that if Israelis saw that the Palestinians are genuinely committed to compromise – instead of counting on the United States to "impose" their demands – Israeli democracy would find a path to a deal.)

On this subject, Hebrew University professor Emanuel Gutmann told the Globe and Mail's Patrick Martin (March 26) that the "majority of Israelis support the idea of a unified Jerusalem in its present boundaries… But a majority of Israelis also support a two-state [Israel-Palestine] solution to this conflict and are prepared to accept compromise in the matter of Jerusalem."

Israelis need to see the same willingness for compromise from the Palestinians. And Tom Friedman needs to understand this, too.

Impairments found to be temporary

Kofman, who was in Toronto recently for a conference on frontal lobes, co-hosted by Baycrest, said she wanted to take advantage of the "ongoing chronic stress the students were subject to, and we wanted to look at the effects of real-life stress on their performance of certain cognitive tasks."

She administered three tests on members of the three groups, none of whom were taking medication or being treated for psychological problems.

But first, the students were subjected to "stress induction." Kofman asked them how many times they'd been exposed to attacks, how many times they heard rockets falling and if they knew anyone who'd been injured. The students were then shown three pictures of actual rocket attacks and instructed to imagine themselves in those situations.

Conference co-hosted by Baycrest

They then performed unrelated cognitive tests, the point of the exercise being that they had to suppress stronger, dominant emotions, such as fear.

"It's parallel to what happens when you have to perform any kind of test when you have a strong emotion in the background," explains Kofman, who earned her doctorate at the University of Toronto. "You sort of have to ignore it, put that aside and continue to function."

The first test was called verbal list learning, in which the students were told to memorize four lists of fruits and vegetables and one list of furniture. Kofman was looking for something called proactive interference, a process in which past memories interfere with the ability to retain new ones. She didn't find it.

"We found that the students who were from Sapir and tested in Sapir, where they'd been exposed to the rockets, their learning was just lower overall. We assumed that it might be because they didn't remember enough words to interfere with subsequent learning."

The second test timed the students as they switched between responses involving colours and shapes. The students from the first group – those in the danger zone – were found to be more accurate, but slower than the others.

"They were using a different strategy," Kofman said. "They may just have been used to being more cautious in general."

The third exercise was the tricky Stroop Test, which forces subjects to inhibit or stop one response in order to say or do something else. For example, it will show the word "blue" in red ink, and subjects are asked to name the colour.

In this task, the students in the danger zone were found to be "significantly less accurate" than those in the other groups, but not slower.

"It's not that they were being sloppy or distracted, but when it came to incongruent words, they had to suppress the natural tendency to read [and they] made more mistakes," Kofman explained.

Kofman steers clear of describing the residents of Sderot as suffering from post traumatic stress disorder (PTSD). She cites another study in which the residents of the town were found to have "ongoing traumatic stress response." The symptoms are similar to PTSD, but the triggers are not in the victim's past. Rather, they keep happening.

An upside to Kofman's study shows that the students' impairments were temporary, as those who were removed from Sderot showed better responses than those who were tested there.

Asked whether her study's results could be true for everyone in Sderot, Kofman said there would be many variables, but "probably."

An old friendship and a very old shul

By GEORGE KUN
Special to The CJN

In 1970, when I was 21 years old and living in Romania, I worked as an international tour guide in the Romanian Black Sea shore resorts. I met lots of interesting people from all over Europe, and speaking seven languages well helped me make many friends.

I got particularly close to one young couple from what is now the Czech Republic, who came to spend their honeymoon in Mamaia, an attractive resort. The bride was four months pregnant and the couple was very happy. Pavel, the groom was a refined, sophisticated intellectual with encyclopedic knowledge of history and arts. We forged a solid friendship, based on common interests, and after their vacation was over, we kept in touch by frequent correspondence for more than 10 years.

Later, our writing faded, and when I immigrated to Canada in 1980, we completely lost touch. I remembered, however, that his mailing address included an easy street number and the name of a famous Czech writer. Another 25 years later, I went on vacation to Croatia, where my wife is from, and we took a minibus trip to Biokovo Mountain, a jewel of a tourist attraction towering over the sparkling blue Adriatic Sea, by Makarska.

There were only four of us on that trip: me, my wife and a younger couple speaking Czech, who sat next to us. The sound of the language of my childhood triggered strong emotions, and I addressed the lady in Czech, asking where they were from.

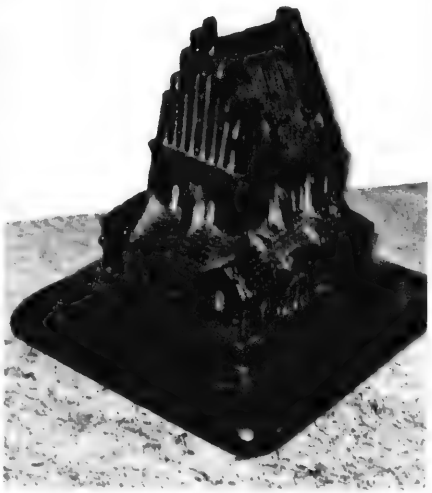
It turned out that they lived in the Czech Republic, in a small town near Prague, where my old friend Pavel was from, and they had also come as tourists to Croatia.

When I bragged about my friend Pavel and the street address I still remembered, it turned out that the woman was Pavel's daughter, precisely the one that 35 years ago was "hiding" in the womb of Pavel's wife on their honeymoon to Romania.

The revelation was shocking, and I obtained Pavel's home phone number from her. We returned to Canada long before our friends returned to the Czech Republic, so when I called Pavel, he was still unaware that I had met his daughter. After 35 years, he recognized my voice rather quickly and was in awe.

One month later, my wife and I decided to take a trip to Prague and we were able to meet him. Pavel was commuting daily by train from his hometown and was teaching arts at a high school in Prague. We spent a few days together walking in the old town, visiting art museums and watching a show at a unique and original puppet theatre that I used to go to as a child.

One day, we strolledthrough the famous old Jewish Ghetto, the largest in medieval Europe, with its famous synagogues, and we stopped at my favorite, the Old New Synagogue, the oldest active shul in Europe. Franz Kafka, the famous writer celebrated, his bar mitzvah there. We went on to visit the layered cemetery, where filming was done for the Fiddler on the Roof movie with Chaim Topol, and we traced the legend of the Golem.



A 350-year old bronze replica of the famous 13th-century Old New Synagogue of Prague.

Prague is a deeply romantic and charming city, a perfect place to rekindle an old friendship. Pavel, long separated from his wife, very much enjoyed the time he spent with us. Our obvious enjoyment and gratitude for having such a graceful host, guide and friend did not go unnoticed, either, and it further cemented our friendship.

The last day before our departure, Pavel showed up at our hotel with a very special gift wrapped in a beautiful cotton pouch. Inside, it was a 350-year-old bronze replica of the famous 13th-century Old New Synagogue of Prague.

Pavel isn't Jewish, but his father's best friend was a rabbi who, before his death, gave the piece of art to Pavel's father as a good luck charm. The little synagogue had been in the rabbi's family for 300 years. Shortly before Pavel's father died, he handed over the precious gift to his son, for his good fortune in life.

And Pavel, when he found out about my Jewish roots and saw my interest in and knowledge of Jewish history in Prague, handed over the gift to me. It came with a hug, a few tears and the telling of the family's history with it.

That old bronze replica of the Old New Synagogue now has a spot of honour in my living room, and in my heart.

On belonging

By MITCHELL PARKER
Special to The CJN

In less than 24 hours on the Saturday night and Sunday morning of the first weekend of March, belonging, long important to me, literally took centre stage.

On Saturday night I was invited by a parent in my school to attend the seudah shlishit and Havdalah being held in honour of the Skverer Rebbe, a renowned spiritual leader, visiting Toronto from the New York City area.

When I arrived, the room was packed with Chassidim standing upon rows and rows of bleachers, listening attentively to each word of the Rebbe sitting on a raised podium in the front of the room flanked by his followers. There was barely any room to move.

Sometimes the Chassidim chanted phrases from the mizmorim following the cue of the Rebbe, other times they danced almost raucously, singing loudly and swaying back and forth on the tiny bench space allotted to each one.

Within moments of my arrival, a total stranger came up to me and offered politely but strongly to lead me into the very centre of activity. (Maybe it was the noticeable lack of black and white in my attire that suggested to him that I was a guest.) Magically, he found me a space at a table that did not look like it could possibly hold another soul. I was touched by the attempt to make me feel that I belonged.

In the next half hour, several others were seated near me in a similar fashion. We were caught up in the moment. We guests, outsiders at the outset, were made to feel as though we belonged and encouraged to participate, each person at his own level of comfort.

A short time later, after squeezing away from the table, I was tapped on the shoulder by a Zareinu parent who was eager to welcome me to the event. He quickly told me that his 15-year-old son was in the thick of things and that he lives for events like these.

Most of the time, a statement like this is interesting but not particularly exciting. But this proud father's declaration was about his 15-year-old with Down syndrome.

The young man has significant academic delays and marked speech difficulties. He also has a sparkling personality. He routinely greets others enthusiastically and can elevate you with his smile. He has the unique ability to make everyone feel like his personal friend.

I have to admit that I never saw him that evening, even though I scanned the room repeatedly. There were so many people in the building. But I left several hours later, with complete confidence that on that late winter evening, at least one of our students felt like I did – we belonged.

Early the next morning I rose early to go to my very first Zimriyah at Convocation Hall at the University of Toronto. Hundreds of day school students in more than a dozen choirs congregated at the site to sing well-practised and choreographed songs and to represent their home schools.

That morning was also to be the first time Zareinu was to participate in the event. Eight of our students, together with an equal number of volunteer students from Associated Hebrew Schools, were soon to get on stage and sing two songs, one in Hebrew and one in English, to the more than 1,000 people in the audience.

I was more than a little bit nervous. Which students might not show up? What might happen if one of our boys or girls could not get up on the stage? What about stage fright? Maybe they would forget the lyrics.

Our turn came about half way through the morning. Not only was our school listed in the program, but now our presence was announced and we were welcomed to perform. We got on the stage quickly.

One student in a wheel chair needed the assistance of an electric lift to get on the stage. Not a big deal. Two of our students who cannot speak, one with autism and the other with cerebral palsy, played percussion instruments.

The others, most singing proudly on key with their new friends from Associated and several belting out the songs in their own unique fashion, stood or sat proudly on the stage as hundreds of people clapped in rhythm to the music or sang along with them. They were the best!

After what seemed like an hour to me – but was actually about five minutes – the 16 students were greeted by prolonged applause from the audience, just as occurred with the choirs that preceded and succeeded them.

After the performance, many people approached our choir director, Wanda Gasscho-White, complimenting us on the quality of our performance and telling us how wonderful it was that we had joined the event. I was now able to leave another event, only hours after the first, confident that these students, too, knew that they belonged.

It has always been important to me that students with challenges be accepted and embraced by the Jewish community. Often I am frustrated that they are cared for and acknowledged but remain on the periphery. On this particular weekend, our students did belong, not by doing anything special, but simply by being given the opportunity to be part of the crowd.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

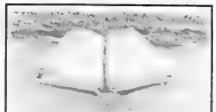
The healing power of memory and ritual

By RABBI RENA ARSHINOFF

Many years passed before a day was demarcated to be an official observance of the six million who perished in Nazi Europe.

The 27th of Nisan is the day that came to be known as Yom Hashoah, and it's observed in Israel and the Diaspora as a vital day of remembrance. This observance is fraught with raw emotions and memories of trauma and loss by those who still survive, as well as by subsequent generations who strive to keep the memory of this atrocity alive so that we do not forget.



Rabbinic Reflections

The questions are complex. How could this have happened? How can we keep this memory with us and with future generations? How do we best pay respect to those who suffered and continue to suffer?

A crucial component of healing is the comfort of memory, which is an important tenet of Jewish tradition. Ritual also has a powerful effect on healing, and this is evident in the significant role that the Mourner's Kaddish and the rituals around shivah play.

The most powerful experience of my year in Israel during rabbinical school was the week of Yom Hashoah. It was not mere coincidence that the State of Israel was established in 1948, not long after the end of World War II and the Holocaust. Israel was to be a homeland that provided comfort and protection for so many people displaced by the Holocaust.

Memory and ritual have immortalized those who perished as a result of being Jewish, and at the same time, have provided healing opportunities for the survivors from the nightmare of this terrible historic catastrophe.

I had the privilege of being at Yad Vashem for the special memorial ceremony. Although I had seen many documentary clips of footage of the camps, the scenes and the faces of the people we saw on the screen at Yad Vashem belonged to the six survivors selected to light the six torches, each representing one million Jews who perished. These were their personal stories. This was their moment to tell their story.

Through the rituals of candlelighting, telling of their loved ones, and prayer, they and the Jewish people mourned the loss of so many. The siren we heard the following morning prompted the country to come to a standstill as everyone stood in silence, mourning an unfathomable number: six million.

Mourning rituals allow us to connect with each other on this day. The prayers of mourning are powerful as we remember. The chanting of Kel Male Rachamim is haunting and reminds us of the tragedy of the number of these horrific deaths.

Yet, in contrast, the Mourner's Kaddish doesn't mention death, but rather, emphasizes life. It speaks of praise for God, and for the continuity of life. It helps us to remember those who no longer have life, whose physical functioning no longer occurs, but whose memories still live with us. Saying this prayer keeps memories alive for us. It elicits emotions that we need to tap. We learn that we can heal and ultimately help others in their pain of loss. In the depths of grief, the people Israel around the world recognize and meet the need for such rituals on Yom Hashoah as a means of connection and a way of healing and renewal, both as a community and as a people.

We remember them – Zichronam livrachah – may their memories be for a blessing.

Rabbi Rena Arshinoff is a chaplain with the trauma, ICU, and nephrology departments at Sunnybrook Health Sciences Centre in Toronto.

God's perfect food

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

As is very typical of this time of year, the seders are barely complete and we immediately begin counting the Omer in preparation for the holiday of Shavuot. It's easy to see how the month in between, Iyar, can be overshadowed by the two great events on either side: Pesach and Shavuot. But with Rosh Chodesh Iyar upon us, we should take a moment and recognize one of the most important events in Judaism that began in the month of Iyar: the manna.

Midrashic Moments

When the Israelites left Egypt, what began was a period of transformation and constant complaining. I like to label that time period "the 40 years of kvetch-du-jour." If we're not whining about the lack of food, we're whining about lack of water. When we have water, we complain it doesn't taste right. When we have food, we complain nostalgically of all the high-end cuts of beef we miss from Egypt, when we had so much meat to eat we had to turn it down. (Nostalgia can be a tricky thing.)

The Israelite complaint about food is an interesting one, since there should be food all around. The entire nation is headed to Sinai to make offerings to God, which necessitates cattle and sheep. Where there's cattle, there's milk, so, in fact, there should be an abundance of both food and liquid, and yet we complain to Moses as if death by starvation is imminent.

Interestingly, God responds by providing unique food. Through the various descriptions of the text, the "bread" God provides rains down from the sky and lays upon the ground as frost would. It's moist, off-white in colour, spoils easily and represents the perfect personal measure of food. The Torah explains that everyone should gather an omer (roughly the size of your stomach), and if someone gathers more or less than an omer, it won't matter since they will ingest exactly an omer.

The midrash in several places augments the information in the Torah by explaining that this perfect food varies in taste, but not in appearance. Although everyone will see the same substance on the ground, if, for example, someone prefers the taste of baked goods, it would take on that taste. This bread from heaven will rain down six days out of seven, and everyone should gather manna in the morning only for that day. However, no one should leave the bread overnight, or it will spoil and worm. On Friday, each person should gather double portions, since it will not rain down on Shabbat. Miraculously (in reality, a miracle within a miracle), the bread gathered on Friday would not spoil when left for Shabbat. This is one of the reasons that Jews today will put two challah breads on the table for Shabbat.

The sages agree that the delivery system of the manna built trust between God and Israel. But the name "manna" still remains a bit of a mystery. The first day that the Israelites saw this bread, they remarked in Hebrew: "Man hu," which means "What is it?" and the name stuck. Manna literally means the "what is that?" or in today's parlance, the "whatchamacallit," because we still don't have a word for that kind of food.

But lacking a proper word does not mean we didn't recognize the symbol. This is food provided by God regularly that is moist, off-white, spoils easily, changes flavour but not appearance, builds trust and perfectly measures to the person's stomach. The only image we can connect this to is mother's milk. According to the descriptions we have, God is nursing Israel, the infant nation that has food all around but cannot access it. As an infant, we turn to God, wanting God to provide for us and keep us safe and feed us.

Later in the Torah, when we once again bombard Moses with our complaints, Moses will turn to God and ask why God expects that Moses will nurse this nation. In the ancient world, it's clear that God is sustaining Israel with food and meaningful symbols. So as we proceed from the seders to begin to count the Omer, which is usually a time when we hold back on public celebrations and gatherings as we remember some of the darker moments of Jewish history – Rabbi Akiva losing his students, the Crusades, Yom Hashoah – it's equally important to remember that we live in a world of balance, and that Iyar reminds us of the beautiful moments of nurturing, trust and bonding between God and the Jewish people.

The Exodus: fact or fiction?

By ALEX GROPPER

Now is the time of year when we celebrate Passover and commemorate the Exodus from Egypt. Passover lies at the heart of our faith. At its core is the theophany on Mount Sinai, when God revealed himself to Moses and gave us the law.

Past Forward

For many, these events have been immortalized in the epic Cecil B DeMille film The Ten Commandments. For most of us, Moses is indelibly imprinted in our consciousness as Charlton Heston, whereas Rameses II will always look like Yul Brynner.

To what extent does the modern discipline of archeology illuminate the events of the Exodus that were so vividly portrayed in The Ten Commandments?

Archeology is a fairly recent discipline. It emerged in the latter part of the 19th century and was galvanized by the search for evidence of another story that is central to the study of the origins of western civilization. That event was the Trojan War, which coincidentally occurred at approximately the same time as the Exodus.

Heinrich Schliemann, a German entrepreneur, claimed to have found proof for the Trojan War. However, in the field of biblical studies, there were many skeptics regarding the ability of archeology to find evidence of the Bible's historical veracity.

The Germans were especially dubious of archeology's ability to find proof for biblical events. Scholars such as Albrecht Alt and Martin Noth preferred to use textual analysis in their important works on biblical history.

It was the American scholar William Foxwell Albright who would influence a generation of both American, and later, Israeli scholars, with his belief that archeology could prove the veracity of the biblical text, including the events of the Exodus.

Albright believed in the historicity of the Exodus. His view was shared by many of his students who studied with him at Johns Hopkins University in Baltimore. These disciples would go on to occupy prominent positions at many major universities in North America. They included George Ernest Wright and Frank Cross at Harvard University, as well as David Noel Freedman of the University of Michigan, and most recently at the University of California at San Diego.

Indeed, the earliest extra-biblical inscription mentioning Israel is the Merneptah Stela, set up by Pharaoh Merneptah, the son of Ramses II (a.k.a. Yul Brynner). It dates to around 1207 BCE, just after the Exodus, which is usually placed around 1250 BCE.

Despite the fact that a people called Israel was mentioned in the Merneptah Stela as living in Israel shortly after the Exodus, recent surveys by Israeli archeologists in the Sinai after both the 1956 Sinai War as well as the Six Day War of 1967 produced no evidence of any large group in the Sinai during the supposed time of the Exodus.

Baruch Halpern, a pupil of Frank Cross as a PhD student at Harvard who now holds the chair of Bible studies at Penn State University, is considered by many to be the pre-eminent biblical historian of this generation. He once jokingly told me that if there was an Exodus, it may have consisted of six or seven runaway slaves from Egypt.

Why the revolutionary change in outlook? Ironically, it was an Israeli scholar, Israel Finkelstein, who helped to start the process with the research for his doctoral dissertation on the settlement of Canaan, which appeared to indicate that the settlement involved indigenous Canaanites and not some outside invading force.

Most of the archeological indicators of radical cultural change such as new pottery styles were absent. The settlement and conquest of Canaan appeared to have all the makings of an "inside job," although some scholars such as James K. Hoffmeier still support the veracity of the Exodus and subsequent conquest.

Yet one wonders if we will ever be able to prove the historicity of the Exodus and whether it really matters. After all, it's a question of faith, and faith by its very definition defies proof.

Free Jewish apps for the iPhone

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Since it was launched in July 2008, Apple's App Store has become an industry leader in carrying apps (applications or programs) for the iPhone, iPod Touch and now the iPad. The store currently has more than 150,000 applications written by third-party vendors, which have accounted for over three billion downloads. [bit.ly/happ01]

The Jewish Highway

Not surprisingly, if you do a bit of searching, you can find plenty of Jewish and Israeli content in the App Store. And although it's called a "store," some developers are happy to create free apps just because they're proud of their work and wanted to share. Today, we'll sample some free Jewish apps.

Don't let Dovid Zikind's iPhone page deceive you. It looks quite plain, but there is a wealth of material there. There is a free, downloadable Chumash and Rashi (with English translation), several holiday guides and, for a fee, the complete Mishnah and Gemara. While there are many texts geared toward the Chabad community (Tanya, HaYom Yom, the 12 Pesukim), there are free siddurim that cater to Ashkenazim, Edot Hamizrach and Lubavitchers. [bit.ly/happ02]

• iSiddur also provides many variations of the morning, afternoon and evening services, as well as Birkat Hamazon. [bit.ly/happ03]

• iPray delivers all 150 Psalms in a clear, Hebrew-only interface. [bit.ly/happ04]

• iMasoret gives you much of the above, along with some novel twists such as the lyrics for popular holiday songs and even direct links to holidays videos from YouTube. Most of the prayers are in Hebrew, although there is some English translation. I just wish the interface were a bit more consistent. [bit.ly/happ05]

If you are looking for apps that are slicker and more sophisticated, and are willing to put your money where your iPhone is, there are plenty of Jewish apps that range in price from 99 cents to $30 or more. The best two places to browse are JewishiPhoneCommunity.org and the Jewish iPhone feed on Twitter. [bit.ly/happ06]

One of the leaders in commercial, Jewish-themed iPhone software is RustyBrink Inc. I give the company credit because it provides a number of free apps too.

• Shabbat Shalom – Check candlelighting and Havdalah times for the week in any location in the world. This is a great app.

• iPhone Shofar – Click on the shofar sound you want to hear: tekiah, shvarim, truah or tekiah gedolah. Have a blast.

Not surprisingly, Jewish food-related apps are quite common. Let's say you've enjoyed your meal, and you want to wait the prescribed amount of time between meat and dairy. Just start your ParveO-Meter. The countdown clock will tell you when it's time to indulge. My only qualm is that the app has very limited preferences to allow customization for various community traditions for waiting. [bit.ly/happ08]

Some apps try to do almost any function you can think of. Others are determined to focus on one goal only. I would say that the KosherFish app falls into the latter category. When you activate it, you are presented with a very, very long list of kosher fish. With this app in hand, never again will you have to walk away from your local fishmonger wondering whether you can feast on Jewfish, Mozambique Mouthbrooder or even Porkfish while remaining faithful to your heritage. You can. [bit.ly/happ09]

Next week, more iPhone app freebies for tourists to Israel and lovers of Hebrew.

Jewish student elected president of SSMU

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Zach Newburgh isn't much of a follower.

As a teen, he was president of his local youth group at Shaarei-Beth El Congregation in Oakville, Ont. Then he became the national president of the North American Federation of Temple Youth.

When he got to university, he became the president of Hillel at McGill, then the house president at Hillel Montreal.

Now a third-year student at McGill University, he has been voted president of the Students Society of McGill University (SSMU).

"I'm a person who is always interested in making sure that our community is the best that it can be. I've always driven toward that," he said, adding that this started in Oakville.

"In Oakville, the Jewish community was the closest community to me... There weren't a lot of Jews in Oakville at the time... I wanted to make sure the Jewish community was the strongest it could be."

Newburgh is now taking this attitude to his university's student council, where one of his goals is to get different groups on campus to come together and find a common identity.

He hopes to accomplish this by "not catering to one particular student, but catering to all students," he said, adding that one way to do this is to concentrate on sports events and athletic activities.

"It's something that is apolitical, it's something every student has in common," he said.

Through his role as house president of Hillel Montreal, Newburgh has been trying to reach out to other campus groups:

"[At Hillel] we've taken... steps to work with Arab, Muslim and Palestinian groups on campus," he said.

"We've been meeting with them and recognizing on the most basic level that we're human beings who are fighting for basic human rights, whether or not they're from different perspectives."

According to Newburgh, his work with Hillel has given him valuable experience.

"I've gained leadership skills," he said.

Zac Newburgh

"Jewish students have largely felt targeted and uncomfortable on campus, as have other student groups. As the president of an organization that deals specifically with groups who feel isolated, I have experience... making [these groups] feel like part of the community."

Newburgh, who is a Middle East studies major, may eventually get involved in politics, and is fascinated by Arab society.

"I think the culture and language is remarkable. [Middle Eastern] politics have always been interesting to me... That interest has been affected by the fact that I'm Jewish," he said, adding that he spent four months in Israel during a high school exchange program.

Rabbi Stephen Wise, spiritual leader of Shaarei-Beth El Congregation, sees Newburgh as a natural leader.

"He's got a charisma about him, he's got this magnetism. People are drawn to him, and when he gets excited about an idea, people want to... help him," Rabbi Wise said. "I can see him being prime minister one day."

Rabbi Wise, who saw Newburgh grow up in Oakville, said the student is not just passionate, but creative.

Newburgh proved this last year when he decided to make and hand out chicken soup at school.

"It wasn't to make money, it was just to give people a big cup of chicken soup and a bit of Jewish love," Rabbi Wise said, adding that it was also a way to get people to stop and talk about Hillel.

"He comes from a tiny community... where he was one of three Jewish kids in a high school of 1,000," Rabbi Wise said.

"He's got his eyes on the big picture... In this climate, where Jewish students feel threatened on campus, to have a leader like him is incredible."

BRIDAL REGISTRY

Holocaust memorial to be unveiled in Owen Sound

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Harry Kozuch will never forget the Holocaust.

He'll never forget being taken to a labour camp at 16, then to two concentration camps. He'll never forget his parents, who were killed in a gas chamber in Auschwitz. And he'll never forget that 33 members of his family were murdered in a few short years.

But for Kozuch, one person's memories are not enough.

"In my extended family, from my father's and mother's side, there were 33 members that perished in the Holocaust," Kozuch, 84, said. "Who remembers them?"

Kozuch was born in Poland and later immigrated to Canada. When he moved from Toronto to Owen Sound, Ont., three years ago he was surprised to learn that the town had no Holocaust memorial. So he voiced his opinion.

"Here in Owen Sound, there's a shul, a Jewish community, and there was not a single memorial or anything to remember the six million Jews," he said. "I started to talk about it."

And the town agreed, said Aly Boltman, an administrator at the city's Beth Ezekiel synagogue and the chair of the Holocaust memorial committee.

"One of our survivors… said, 'I really feel there's a lack here.'

"We all looked at each other and said, 'Of course [there is],'" she said. "It was never a question of should we, it was more of a question of how should we."

The Jewish community in Owen Sound is a small one, and eight or nine years ago, it was even smaller.

In 2001, Beth Ezekiel synagogue had only 15 families, and the Jewish population was decreasing. A Holocaust memorial wasn't an option.

"It was this fatalistic attitude that the synagogue can't survive. [Jews] were watching kids move to cities. [The Jewish community] was just sort of struggling," Boltman said.

But times have changed. While the community is still small, Beth Ezekiel is thriving. In 2007, 52 families were involved in the synagogue. Now, the shul has about 120 members, or 60 families.

In 2008, the synagogue began to fundraise for the memorial, which will be unveiled on Apr. 11.

"It went fantastically well," Boltman said of the fundraising event, an auction called Let My People Bid.

The memorial itself is a large tree, carved out of wood, with a yellow star at its centre, a dove at the top, barbed wire and a banner with the Hebrew phrase for "to remember and not to forget."

It was created by Brahm Friedlander, a woodcarver, and Ofra Svorai, a painter, and took about 1,000 hours to make.

Gary Weinger, the synagogue's vice-president, understands the importance of a Holocaust memorial. His parents were Holocaust survivors, and he learned about their experiences as a child, while hiding under the table at get-togethers.

"I got a first-hand historical account [of the Holocaust] from my father and all the men that would come together," he said. "It's easy to forget and put things in the back of your mind and just go through daily life. It's something that needs to be remembered."

For Weinger, seeing the design for the memorial was an emotional experience.

"[The tree] is a symbol of great rooting and strength. The first thing that came to my mind is I saw my mother and father behind the iron gates and barbed wire," he said.

"If you just look at [the memorial] as a piece of artwork…, it might not reach you… For us, it really means something."

The memorial's formal unveiling will take place on Apr. 11 at 7 p.m. at Beth Ezekiel Synagogue and will be followed by the screening of Our Father's Bar Mitzvah, a documentary about the life of a Beth Ezekiel member and Holocaust survivor made by a local filmmaker.

For more information, e-mail aly.boltman@bethezekiel.org.

Beth Ezekiel Synagogue's Holocaust memorial, created by Brahm Friedlander and Ofra Svorai, will be unveiled Apr. 11 in Owen Sound, Ont.

Oshawa, Ajax shuls unite to hold Holocaust memorial

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Two Ontario shuls are coming together to remember the six million Jews that were killed in the Holocaust.

Beth Zion Congregation in Oshawa and B'Nai Shalom V'Tikvah in Ajax will be holding a Holocaust memorial service on April 11 from 7 to 9 p.m. The service will be held at Beth Zion synagogue, located at 144 King St. E. in Oshawa.

The shuls will commemorate the victims of the Holocaust as well as genocides taking place worldwide at a candlelighting service that includes songs and readings.

Judy Lysy, a Holocaust survivor, will speak at the memorial. Lysy, born in Czechoslovakia, was deported to the Auschwitz-Birkenau concentration camp. She also worked in other slave labour camps and was liberated by the U.S. army in 1945.

Library reaches the next generation of Jews

By LAUREN KRAMER
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — This month 360 Jewish children in British Columbia received their first of a series of gifts in the mail: a book for and about Jewish children.

The books arrived on their doorsteps thanks to the PJ Library, an initiative begun four years ago in western Massachusetts by Harold Grinspoon. Some would say, "it's just a book," but to Grinspoon and the 125 communities across North America who support the library, it is a key investment in raising children with a strong Jewish identity.

Grinspoon, who is dyslexic, first began to understand the power of literature on children when he watched a father calm his child on an airplane by reading to him. Then he heard on the radio that singer Dolly Parton was giving away free books to disadvantaged families, and decided to join her. So he called Parton's Imagination Library and sponsored her program in Springfield, Mass., the city he calls home.

Free books made available to children

At a Passover seder at his son's house, he watched his daughter-in-law give picture books with Jewish themes to each guest, and was surprised by the quality of stories and illustrations, and by the fact that his grandchildren cherished these books. It dawned on him that a Jewish version of Parton's Imagination Library would be a fine idea.

It started in western Massachusetts with 200 participants and a goal of reaching 5,000 participants across the country within five years. But just four years later he has given away two million books. Today, there are 60,000 children in the United States and Canada receiving books, thanks to the PJ Library. British Columbia was the most recent community to join the library, following closely on the heels of Montreal, Calgary and Winnipeg.

Participants have children aged between six months and five years old. They receive 11 books and one CD a year per subscription, and Grinspoon vets every choice. "We're looking for books that will inspire parents and families in thinking about their Jewish lives," explains Natalie Blitt, program director for book selection at the PJ Library.

"We look for a balance of books that reflect the diversity within the Jewish community and that deal with holidays, values, ethics, folk tales and Bible stories. Not every book will appeal to every child or family, but we hope families will see themselves in some of the books and not in others, so kids can understand there are many different ways of doing things Jewishly."

Eighty-eight titles are selected each year, and a handful are by Canadian authors, published by Canadian publishing houses. Canadian titles include Bagels from Benny by Aubrey Davis, Clever Rachel by Debby Waldman, The Market Wedding by Cary Fagan and The Kugel Valley Klezmer Band by Betty Ann Stuchner.

"People think they know what Jewish books look like," Blitt adds. "Our goal is to choose compelling books that are every bit as interesting as other books on a kids' bookshelf. For our program to work, the books have to be tantalizing and exceptional."

For each subscription, Grinspoon's Harold Grinspoon Foundation provides $60, and regional Jewish agencies, synagogues and donor families provide $40 in matching funds. At the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver, $150,000 has been earmarked for the PJ Library, to keep it going for the next three years. Right now, 360 families are enrolled, but numbers will likely climb, says Michael Fugman, chair of the federation board.

"What we've learned is that once this program starts, it grows. People specifically donated funds toward the PJ Library, and if the need exists, I have no doubt we will be able to come up with more funds, because the people in our community are very generous."

Fugman says the PJ Library plays a crucial role in reaching the next generation of Jews. "We strongly believe we have a responsibility to do outreach to outlying communities, and it's hard to get those people involved in this community. This PJ Library provides an opportunity to get people from the whole province involved and aware of Judaism. It's also a chance for families to spend time reading together. Until you have kids, you don't realize how important reading is."

Ginaya Peters, a Vancouver Jewish mom of three children aged between two and four, says the books provide a great resource. "There's not much in the public libraries with Jewish content, and in the bookstores the books on Judaism are so generic. This library will give us more of a variety and insight into Jewish culture. It will be that something special that we get every month and can sit together as a family and read."

Local sponsors in participating communities frequently forward to Grinspoon letters of gratitude from people who are making more Jewish choices after reading their books, such as holding their first Passover seder or sitting down for a family Sabbath dinner. Grinspoon, a humble man, cherishes those letters. Together with his wife, Diane Troderman, he has given away more than $100 million in recent years – most of it to Jewish causes.

The couple plans to give away a few hundred million more dollars and has willed their estate to their foundation with the intention of endowing the PJ Library forever.

Hydro-Quebec postpones seder night power cut

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Residents of the Outremont and de Vimy Street areas avoided having to conduct their first seder in the dark after Hydro-Quebec responded to complaints about a planned power break.

The utility had notified residents late last month that the electricity would be cut from Monday night, March 29, at 11:30 p.m. through to 4:30 a.m. on March 30 as part of a load-shedding procedure that is fairly frequent in the area.

Rabbi Mordechai Bulua, who lives on Van Horne Avenue, phoned Hydro immediately to point out that it was the start of a major Jewish holiday and, although the hour was late, many seders would just be beginning at 11:30 p.m. and would likely continue into the wee hours.

The area is home to a large Jewish population, mostly Orthodox. Rabbi Bulua pointed out that with the return to daylight saving time on March 14 sundown is now quite late. By the time people get home from synagogue, it is nearing midnight.

Hydro told him the shutdown could not be avoided. Rabbi Bulua then complained to B'nai Brith Canada and to the office of Outremont's MNA, Finance Minister Raymond Bachand.

He doesn't know if Bachand did anything, but B'nai Brith did phone Hydro, underlining the importance of Passover to its Jewish customers, and things changed quickly.

Rabbi Bulua said there were apparently other complaints from residents.

On March 26, Hydro apologized and announced the shutdown would take place one week later, on April 5, from 11:30 p.m. to 4:30 p.m.

Even though this is the second-to-last day of Passover and a holy day, Rabbi Bulua said he's satisfied that Hydro extended a "reasonable accommodation" to the community.

Montreal police investigate 'human soap' sale

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Montreal police are investigating a complaint that a Jewish dealer in Nazi memorabilia offered a bar of soap for sale suggesting that it was made of human remains.

The existence of the soap on display at La Boutique du collectioneur Botines on St. Laurent Boulevard came to light March 26 in a CBC radio report. CJAD radio reported the following day that the shop's owner, who is Jewish, had sold the soap for $150.

The complaint was filed by B'nai Brith Canada under a Criminal Code section forbidding the desecration of human remains. While there have been persistent rumours since World War II that the Nazis made soap from the fat of Jews who died in the concentration camps, Israel's Holocaust authority Yad Vashem has denied it.

After the news broke, the shop's owner, whose name is Abraham Botines, said he never claimed that the soap, in fact, contained any human remains.

He said he bought the bar of soap from a retired Canadian soldier who told him he found it in a concentration camp. He also claimed he tried to sell the item to a Holocaust museum, which refused the offer.

He said that the existence of such items, authentic or not, is part of the historical record of Nazi atrocities and he will continue dealing in memorabilia of that era until he's told it's illegal to do so.

B'nai Brith regional director Heidi Oppen visited the shop on March 26, posing as a customer. The bar, which was in a glass case, was wrapped in a cover that had a small swastika and German writing, which she did not understand. The CBC said a card in the case read "Poland 1940."

Botines refused to speak to her, but another person working there, who identified himself as Jewish, did speak to her. He didn't tell her explicitly that it was human soap, and defended offering it for sale as a means of preserving history.

The store has been in business for more than 40 years.

Oppen also noticed pack of cigarettes with swastikas. She said she was most disturbed to see the soap near mezzuzot and other Jewish religious items.

B'nai Brith is leaving it to the police to determine if there is a criminal case – if not desecration of a body, then possibly fraud.

In any event, Oppen said trying to profit from goods that are even suggestive of the suffering of Holocaust victims is highly offensive.

The sale of items bearing swastikas is not illegal in Canada.

Eiran Harris, archivist emeritus of Montreal's Jewish Public Library, said claims that soap made from human fat by the Nazis have been rampant for decades. He said the archives holds several such bars, all fakes.

The rumour that the Nazis made such soap was started in 1943 by the Soviet Union's NKVD, forerunner of the KGB secret police, as a propaganda tool against the Nazis, Harris added.

Going to shul when Kaddish is over

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

"What are you smiling about?" a colleague inquired as I arrived at the office

I couldn't bring myself to give her an honest answer, despite her friendly tone. I suppose I could have told her the truth: that I was in a good mood because I had gone to an early-morning service at my synagogue. In fact, the situation struck me as amusing, if somewhat strange.

It was May 26 of last year – a Tuesday. Three days earlier, I had finished saying Kaddish for my father. Originally – based on what others had told me – I expected to stop, feel a void for a while after 11 months of attending twice-daily services, and then fill my time with other things. I assumed I'd be back on Saturdays – because, well, that's the day you go to shul.

But of all the services I attended during the 11 months of Kaddish, weekday mornings on my way to work had turned out to be my favourite. I loved the camaraderie of the more intimate group, and the feeling that my day was off to a good start. I liked the kibbitzing, and the conversation over breakfast. I said many times over the course of the year that I couldn't have chosen a better group to say Kaddish with if I had hand-picked them.

I also found that I liked the prayer component. I liked that it gave me time to reflect. I liked being in sync with other Kaddish-sayers as we recited the words in unison. I liked the connection I felt to my synagogue community, and to my religion. I liked the quirks of our minyan, from the finicky ark doors that had to be closed just so, to the way participants often ended up walking the length of the chapel because of the number of people wanting to shake their hands after an honour.

Instead of quitting the minyan cold turkey, as some people do when they finish saying Kaddish, I had decided to taper off gradually. During the week, I would continue to wake up early and alternate between working out and going to shul for at least one more month. Although Kaddish is traditionally said for a parent for 11 months, the mourning period actually lasts a year.

On the Monday of my first week post-Kaddish, I left my house early for a "power" walk. I'd been in the habit of walking in the morning years ago and enjoyed the sense of well-being it gave me. But that morning, I spent most of my walk missing the minyan and the company of the people I'd been sharing breakfast with. I looked forward to being there the next day, although I wondered if anyone would think I was prolonging the mourning period unduly.

It isn't uncommon for men to become minyan "regulars" once Kaddish is over, but – at least at the earlier of the two morning services at my synagogue, Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am – women rarely go, unless they are saying Kaddish or observing a yahrzeit.

Also, at Beth David, which is Conservative, women aren't counted as part of the traditional prayer quorum (although we do receive Torah honours). A cousin of mine, who belongs to a Reform congregation, told me that when she finished saying Kaddish every day, she decided that she would continue going to services on occasion to help make up the minyan, as a way of paying back – or paying forward – the support she had received there. I didn't have that excuse either.

Nor am I a davener – someone who is proficient in prayer – like my father was. I'm more a follow-along-er.

But if any of the regulars thought it was odd that I was there, they didn't let on – at least not to my knowledge.

I continued as planned until my father's first yahrzeit, alternating shul with walking or working out, on weekday mornings.

I decided to keep up the routine through the summer, but once fall arrived, I felt more strongly that I needed an excuse to go to morning minyan. As it happened, that wasn't a problem. I'd go when someone was finishing Kaddish or observing a yahrzeit, and a couple of times a friend who was still saying Kaddish suggested that I attend when he was reading Torah.

By the end of December, though, most of my shul friends had finished their 11 months, and I was pretty much out of excuses for being there. And yet, seven months had gone by since the end of May, and it didn't seem inconceivable any more to go to the minyan without an excuse.

In January, I decided that I would continue attending services one morning a week before work – whether I had an excuse or not. Having acquired the habit of waking up early during Kaddish, I'm also able to get to the gym regularly.

I still go to shul on Shabbat, and a small group that I said Kaddish with meets on Sunday morning to walk before services.

Late last summer, by coincidence, my mother came across a letter from my dad, in which he wrote about his own synagogue attendance. He had sent it to my aunt and uncle in 1944, when he was a 22-year-old serving in the RCAF in England during World War II. He had no way of knowing the significance it would eventually have for us.

Prompted by his thoughts on a talk about religion that he'd heard on his base, my father wrote, "The simple truth is that I get a kick out of [going to shul]. I attend synagogue because I enjoy myself there ... it gives me a certain amount of pleasure to carry on traditions that have been passed down through centuries."

It seems the rationale I was looking for had been there all along.

Being Erica's creator juggles a career and motherhood

BY SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

When Canadian television writer Jana Sinyor was still in the struggling phase of her career and years away from creating the CBC drama Being Erica, she fainted after her first project, Dark Oracle, was finally greenlighted.

Sinyor's over-wrought reaction was perhaps understandable.

Having worked so hard to break into the industry, she was absolutely floored when YTV, the children's channel, accepted Dark Oracle, which follows the adventures of 15-year-old twins whose future is divined in a comic book

"I had to be revived," she said, her eyes beaming as she recalled the embarrassing moment that set her on the road to success.

Dark Oracle, co-developed with Heather Conkie, ran from 2004 to 2006 and went on to win an International Emmy for best children's and youth program. But after it was suddenly dropped, Sinyor moved on stoically and quickly.

"I was neither disappointed nor angry," she said in an interview the other morning at the Future Bakery and Cafe in mid-town Toronto. "Dark Oracle was a 'high-concept' show, which is hard to sustain."

Sinyor, who had previously freelanced as a writer for Degrassi: The Next Generation, bounced back by developing Being Erica, which is about a 30-something woman who discovers that her therapist can send her back in time and change her reality.

Nominated for 10 Gemini Awards after its debut year in 2009, Being Erica is now broadcast on the Soap Net cable network in the United States, as well as in Australia, Asia, Latin America and, she thinks, Israel.

To the best of her knowledge, the core audience consists mainly of women in their 20s and 30s. But teens and middle-aged viewers, some of whom are men, are also part of the demographics.

She believes that Being Erica has mass appeal because the average viewer can identify with the main character.

Now 33, Sinyor conceived Being Erica – which blends fantasy with reality – as a kids' program. But since CBC was in the market for something different, she was only too pleased to adjust the script.

As she put it, "I wanted to make the jump from teen to adult drama."

There was another reason for her interest in adapting Being Erica.

Erin Karpluk and Jana Sinyor

"I have a huge interest in magic and fantasy, and I like playing around with time travel."

Erica Strange, the central character, is portrayed by Erin Karpluk. To some degree, she is modeled after Sinyor, who was born in Ottawa, the daughter of Albert, an Egyptian-born medical equipment manufacturer, and Lynda, a teacher and computer programmer.

"You put bits and pieces of yourself and familiar experiences into a character," explained Sinyor, the co-executive producer. "Erica's my age, is Jewish like me and lives in Toronto. But aside from these similarities, we're not alike at all."

Karpluk, who is of Ukrainian descent, was cast at the 11th hour.

"We saw many actors, but it was clear she was exactly who we were looking for. Erin has a talent for physical comedy, and she's just so appealing, attractive, funny and accessible."

But Karpluk had to be coached to be Jewish.

"She knew nothing about Jews, but she's been great," noted Sinyor, saying she had to learn how to properly pronounce a word like Yom Kippur.

Sinyor, who describes herself as a secular Jew, has embroidered Jewish motifs into the show.

"We've done episodes on circumcision, Yom Kippur and a bat mitzvah," she said.

To Sinyor, these forays into Judaism are "not forced" but natural. After all, Erica is supposed to be the daughter of a Reform rabbi.

She and her co-producer, Aaron Martin, whom she met on the set of Degrassi and who joined Being Erica after the pilot, have written several of the scripts.

But overall, she regards herself as its general manager, concerning herself with every aspect from casting and script development to wardrobe.

Currently, she and Martin are in the midst of developing season three of Being Erica.

"I'm optimistic it will go ahead," said Sinyor

Curiously enough, she never even aspired to be a writer.

"Actually, I didn't have a plan," she admitted.

Taking religious studies at McGill University, she majored in the New Testament and took a course in rabbinics.

"I was already familiar with Judaism, but Christianity was foreign to me."

After her graduation in 1998, she toiled in a call centre for a year, but was miserable.

"I became very depressed."

In retrospect, this dead-end job was not entirely in vain. "Erica also worked in a call centre," she said.

One night, at 4 a.m., she compiled a life-changing list of her strengths, desires and weaknesses.

With this in hand, Sinyor took a screen writing course at Ryerson. While there, she whipped up a script for a short film.

Then she enrolled at the Canadian Film Centre, which offers advanced training in film, TV and new media.

"It was extremely useful, but I couldn't find a job after graduating."

So she began writing what would be Dark Oracle, her breakthrough show.

Sinyor has a busy life outside television. She and her husband, David Singer, an entrepreneur, have two children, Jada, 5, and Max, 3.

She has no trouble juggling a career and motherhood.

"I don't have a nine to five job. I have a lot of flexibility. So I'm at home when Jada and Max get back from school."

As for the future, she hopes that Being Erica will go from strength to strength, and that her next project will also appeal to an identical demographic. "I don't know what it will be, but it will be an adult drama," she said.

China to attend summit on Iranian nukes

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

WASHINGTON — Chinese President Hu Jintao will attend a multi-nation summit on nuclear security in Washington this month, the Chinese Foreign Ministry said last week.

The announcement came as Beijing appeared to drop its opposition to possible new United Nations sanctions against Tehran over its uranium enrichment program and as Iran's top nuclear negotiator arrived for talks with Chinese officials.

Beijing would not officially confirm reports that it would support sanctions, and a Chinese foreign ministry spokesperson said April 1 that it still favored a diplomatic approach to the problem.

"We have always and will continue to push for a peaceful settlement on this issue," spokesperson Qin Gang said. "We are staying and will stay in communication with all parties."

U.S. officials said that a Chinese representative made a commitment to the sanction in a March 31 phone call with officials from the United States, Russia, China, Britain, France and Germany to discuss the specifics of a potential UN Security Council resolution, and that on that basis the United States would press ahead with an effort to pass such a measure.

The officials cautioned that this does not mean there is a full consensus on UN sanctions. U.S. President Barack Obama said March 30 that he hoped the Security Council would adopt tougher sanctions against Iran within "weeks" if the Islamic republic continued to refuse to comply with the council's resolutions on the matter.

"China has agreed to sit down and begin serious negotiations here in New York… as a first step toward getting the entire UN Security Council on board with a tough sanctions regime against Iran," Susan Rice, the U.S. ambassador to the UN, told CNN on March 31.

Obama will host the summit on April 12-13, and some observers had speculated Hu would not go because of recent tensions between the two powers.

The discussions surrounding Iran may mark the first time China will have agreed to sanctions, a move that comes after months of pressure from the Obama administration. The other countries involved in the discussions are the United States, Russia, Britain, Germany and France, Reuters reported.

But while the agreement seems to be an achievement for the Obama administration, China will agree only to relatively weak sanctions, the news agency quoted diplomats as saying.

While Obama said he hoped the sanctions would be in place within weeks, Security Council deliberations could drag on until June.

Even then, additional sanctions imposed separately by the United States and other western countries will be needed to keep Iran from going nuclear.

Israel had initially hoped, after talks with U.S. officials, that the sanctions would be declared at the beginning of this year.

A recent CIA report said Iran is moving closer to becoming a nuclear power, apparently signalling a change in the thinking of U.S. intelligence community since late 2007, when a separate report found there was no proof Iran had renewed its work toward a military-grade nuclear weapon after it was halted in 2003.

The International Atomic Energy Agency also suspects Iran is building another uranium enrichment facility, according to a report released last week.

The sense from these reports, as from conversations with senior Israeli government and military figures, is that the world now fully accepts Israel's conclusion that Iran is seeking to obtain nuclear arms and has overcome initial resistance to the finding. At least in the West, there is widespread agreement that Iran has reached an advanced stage of its nuclear program and that none of the steps taken so far have diverted it from that goal.

The key question is how far the world powers are prepared to go to stop the nuclear program.

The latest CIA report, whose tone is general and does not openly contradict the 2007 report, does not necessarily attest to American determination.

Sources in Jerusalem say that behind closed doors, U.S. and European officials are already discussing how to face the "day after" Iran attains nuclear weapons.

Rise of conservative right alarming Hungary's Jews

By RUTH ELLEN GRUBER
JTA

PRAGUE — The radical far-right Jobbik party is poised to emerge in next month's elections in Hungary as a potent force in Parliament, and the prospect is ringing alarm bells in central Europe's largest Jewish community.

"It's scary," said Vera Szekeres-Varsa, a Holocaust survivor and former chair of the Hungarian branch of Amnesty International. "It's not like 60 or 70 years ago, but it's still scary."

Jobbik, whose formal name is the Movement for a Better Hungary, campaigns with fiercely populist rhetoric that capitalizes on seething voter resentment, and foments fear and hatred of the mainly impoverished population of Roma, or Gypsies. Targeting what it calls "Gypsy criminality," Jobbik also warns against "foreign speculators," including Israel, that it says want to control the country.

"Hungary belongs to the Hungarians" is a party slogan.

"Jobbik frequently uses anti-Semitic rhetoric, not directly but through code words and references, as well as symbols and appearances," said Andras Kovacs, a sociologist at the Central European University in Budapest who for some time, has tracked nationalist and anti-Semitic trends. "This is frightening for the Jewish population."

While the conservative Fidesz party is expected to score an overwhelming victory in the April 11 first-round parliamentary vote – ousting the widely unpopular Socialists who have been in power since 2002 – Jobbik is expected to make a strong showing and enter the Hungarian Parliament for the first time. Jobbik surged out of the far-right fringe to grab 15 per cent of the vote in European Parliament elections last June.

Aside from Jobbik's growing strength, Hungarian Jews are concerned that Fidesz may compete with Jobbik for votes by shifting some of its own positions more to the right.

For Hungary's Jews, who overwhelmingly vote for the centre-left parties, including the Socialists, the rise of the conservative right is a concern.

Gabor Vona

"I think they will have to make gestures to the far right," Adam Schonberger, 30, an activist with the Conservative Jewish youth organization Marom, said of Fidesz. "What really worries me is that in the upcoming parliament, there could be no real representative of liberal or minority values."

A poll of decided voters published March 18 in Hungary's HVG weekly showed Fidesz with 57 per cent support, the Socialist party with 21 per cent and Jobbik with 18 per cent.

"It is possible that Jobbik will get close to or even more votes than the Socialists," Kovacs said. "Fidesz for sure will have a majority, and may get a two-thirds majority. This will represent a substantial change in the electoral landscape."

A two-thirds majority would enable Fidesz, led by the charismatic Viktor Orban, to amend the constitution and push through changes affecting the electoral law, the size of Parliament, presidential powers, local governments and other issues.

No single party has held that concentration of power since the Nazi-allied regime of Miklos Horthy.

Fidesz enjoys some Jewish support and is not considered to be anti-Semitic. It was a Fidesz-led government that instituted Hungary's Holocaust Memorial Day in 2001. Yet some Jobbik officials and Fidesz have collaborated on activities at the local level.

While Fidesz has ruled out a coalition with Jobbik if Fidesz does not achieve a two-thirds majority on its own, a poll last December indicated that some 300,000 right-wing Fidesz supporters might be ready to shift their support to Jobbik. Fidesz may attempt to forestall such defections by hardening some of its own positions.

Support for Hungary's centre-left parties has plummeted due to the economic downturn and a recent spate of high-profile corruption scandals. In one case, several Socialist politicians were implicated in a racketeering scandal involving the Budapest public transport agency. In another, the Socialist mayor of Budapest's old Jewish quarter, the Seventh District, was arrested on bribery and other charges relating to real estate deals.

"The collapse of the liberal and centre-left parties is of particular concern to Hungary's Roma and Jews, who are targeted verbally – and in the case of the Roma, also sometimes physically – by right-wing sympathizers," said historian Michael Miller, who teaches in the Jewish studies department at the Central European University.

Last year, a landmark court ruling banned the Hungarian Guard, Jobbik's uniformed paramilitary wing, whose black-clad members marched through Roma villages bearing red and white striped flags and other symbols reminiscent of the World War II Arrow Cross, Hungary's homegrown Nazi-allied fascists.

A little more than a year ago, Krisztina Morvai, who was later elected one of Jobbik's three European Parliament members, lashed out at Israel for its offensive in Gaza.

"The only way to talk to people like you is by assuming the style of Hamas," she wrote in an open letter to the Israeli ambassador to Hungary. "I wish all of you lice-infested, dirty murderers will receive Hamas' 'kisses.'"

At a party rally March 15, Jobbik's 31-year-old leader, Gabor Vona, told thousands of followers that Hungary must seek independence from "Washington, Brussels [i.e., the European Union], Tel Aviv" and other powers.

Jobbik party members

Websites and publications linked to Jobbik are much more explicit, bashing Israel and employing vicious anti-Semitic invective that evokes Nazi-era propaganda.

"Hungary is a Jewish colony" was the headline of an interview on one such website with the brother of one of Jobbik's vice presidents.

Kovacs says he believes Jews are fearful of Jobbik's gains but are less worried that they will translate into anti-Jewish policies. About 100,000 Jews live in Hungary, most of them in Budapest.

"With Jews, there is no practical social tension," Kovacs said. "The anti-Jewish discourse is rhetorical, but there are no anti-Jewish political demands. There are, however, radical anti-Roma demands, like cutting social benefits or segregation in school."

Still, he said, "loud, verbal anti-Semitism can lead to a very polarized and intense atmosphere, which in turn could facilitate, for example, anti-Jewish street violence."

Szekeres-Varsa said the cumulative impact was very unsettling.

"I don't see a direct threat, but there is an appalling atmosphere," she said. "The air is stinking, and there is great uncertainty."

In an incident that may be related to the current pre-election climate, the Budapest home of Chabad Rabbi Shmuel Raskin was stoned twice during last Tuesday night's seder, according to Israel Radio. Police came after the first incident, and the second incident reportedly took place after the police left. No suspects were reported arrested in the attack at press time.

Schonberger called Jobbik "a very aggressive, radical, arrogant party.

"If they are able to make other people stupid and soulless, that is the worst," he said. "We have to maintain our consciousness and keep our two feet on the ground."

'It's not a one-man show'

Through his involvement in course development and research at Ben-Gurion University's medical school, Singer introduced palliative care to the family residency training curriculum. To expand his own knowledge, he did a palliative care fellowship in his native Montreal in 1995 and 1996.

He now oversees home-care hospices in Kiryat Gat and in Rahat, the largest Bedouin city in Israel. Five years ago, the program rolled out a mobile palliative care unit (MPCU) to serve Bedouins and Jews living in remote areas. In addition to his regular clinic hours, Singer serves on the MPCU twice a week.

The main target population of about 180,000 Bedouin Muslims is spread out over six townships and in isolated, primitive, temporary encampments. Home visits are conducted by the mobile unit's rotating team of nurses, social workers, physicians (Jewish and Bedouin) and Bedouin driver-translators.

"It's not a one-man show. I could never do something like this myself," said Singer, who relaxes with his gardening and photography or by travelling around the world.

Singer notes that Bedouin Muslim patients don't balk at being treated by Jewish doctors, and in his experience, Jews don't mind being treated by Arab doctors.

Dying people, regardless of culture, geography or socio-economic conditions, experience similar emotions, he said. "The sadness of departing, the fear – not really of death, but of what's going to happen on the way – and an urge to close circles, to say goodbye and to forgive. All these are quite universal. And if we could concentrate on our commonalities more than our differences, we would be much better off."

His conviction that each of us has a personal responsibility to help the helpless led Singer to spend two years at a Swiss Protestant mission hospital in southern Africa after earning his medical degree from the Hebrew University of Jerusalem in 1982.

"People thought I was crazy," he recalled.

He worked in a 500-bed hospital where each bed was usually shared by two patients. "I did a lot of community health development and food projects. There was a lot of malnutrition there, and children were dying of hunger."

He and his wife, a music teacher who now practises alternative medicine, returned to Israel and settled in Be'er Sheva, the largest city in the Negev. They have raised their four children there. Both before and after his appointment as head of the home palliative care unit, Singer cared for poor patients in a nearby development town as a family physician.

Israel Briefs

Schalit's release demanded

Israeli reserve soldiers delivered a letter demanding the release of captive Israeli soldier Gilad Schalit to Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu. The reservists, who protested last week outside the Prime Minister's Office, gave the letter to the prime minister's bureau chief, as well as a letter addressed to the prime minister's wife written by Raviv Kurtz, the wife of a reserve soldier and a friend of Tammy Arad, the wife of missing navigator Ron Arad. "It appears that the prime minister is unwilling to complete the necessary step to save Gilad Schalit's life," the reservists' letter read. "We call on you as citizens and soldiers aware of the Schalit family's pain – restore Gilad his freedom."

Arms cache found in Sinai

A large arms cache allegedly intended to be smuggled into the Gaza Strip was discovered in the Sinai Desert. Egyptian security forces found the cache, including 100 anti-aircraft missiles and other explosives last week, according to Egyptian reports cited in the Israeli press. The weapons reportedly were collected from the areas of past battle zones. The weapons smugglers are believed to be Sinai Bedouin. The find comes a day after Egyptian police discovered 41 cars and other vehicles used for smuggling merchandise into Gaza, the French news agency AFP reported. The vehicles were confiscated in the Sinai. Three new smuggling tunnels connecting Rafah to Gaza also were discovered last week.

UN agency raps Israel

The United Nations Human Rights Council last month passed three resolutions that condemn Israel and another seeking reparations for Gaza Palestinians. The United States opposed the resolutions, which passed by a large margin. Canada does not have a seat in the body. The 47-member council passed resolutions that condemn Israel's "grave human rights violations" in the West Bank and Gaza, and call on Israel to pull out of territory claimed by the Palestinians and stop settlement building and evacuate existing settlements, and condemn Israel for the "systematic violation of the rights of the people of the occupied Syrian Golan Heights." An additional resolution called on Israel to compensate Palestinians in Gaza for damage and loss incurred during last year's war there. Israel has been censured by the council, which was formed in 2006, more times than any other country.

Baryshnikov coming to Israel

Legendary dancer and choreographer Mikhail Baryshnikov will perform in Israel in late June, in a joint performance with Ana Laguna. The performance, titled "Three solos and a duet," will include choreography by Mats Ek (Laguna's husband), Benjamin Millepied and Alexei Ratmansky. Baryshnikov, 62, will dance throughout. He instructed promoters to give away 50 free tickets to each of his three shows to ballet students, according to their teacher's recommendations. "Three solos and a duet" premiered in Riga, Latvia, the city of Baryshnikov's birth, last year and has been staged in Europe and the United States.

Jihadists target economy: scholar

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Jihadists want to damage western interests by resorting to economic terrorism, says an Israeli scholar who has studied thousands of their websites.

In a new monograph titled Econo-Jihad: How the Terrorists See the Global Crisis, Gabriel Weimann, a University of Haifa professor of communications who has published books and papers on modern terrorism and the mass media, writes, "For the Jihadists, the present economic crisis signifies an ideal opportunity and platform to [carry out] an economic terrorist campaign."

Weimann, who has monitored the jihadist world for years, compiled his study by surveying public and encoded websites, video clips and Internet forums.

He claims that the jihadi emphasis on targeting economic targets was set in motion by Al Qaeda's destruction of the World Trade Center in Manhattan on Sept. 11, 2001.

Gabriel Weimann

In video tapes sent to the media, Al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden boasted that while the Sept. 11 operation cost $500,000 to implement, the attack caused $500 billion worth of damage to the U.S. economy.

Weimann said that jihadists, having concluded that western and U.S. power is a function of economic strength, have decided to hit international corporations, strike multinational companies in Iraq extracting oil, and assassinate key figures in the global economy, many of whom they believe are Jews.

Jihadists may also try to persuade the world's 1.5 billion Muslims to pressure their respective governments to adjust their foreign policies, he added.

This Muslim constituency can become "an economic threat and a basis for pressure," he said in an interview last week.

Jihadists hope that the current insurgency against U.S. forces in Iraq and Afghanistan will help drain U.S. financial resources and ultimately harm the American economy, said Weimann, a former visiting professor at Carleton University in Ottawa and co-author of a 1986 book on neo-Nazi Ernst Zundel, Hate on Trial: The Zundel Case, the Media and Public Opinion in Canada.

Weimann has surfed 7,500 terrorist websites, some of which are "very sophisticated," and he said Jihadists use such Internet platforms as Facebook, YouTube, Twitter and chatrooms.

Although he doesn't know the size of their audience, he's certain these websites are popular and effective.

Asked how he had penetrated protected encoded sites, he replied, "When you live in a bad neighbourhood long enough, you know the neighbours and their habits and learn the rules of the game." In conclusion, Weimann warned that governments that do not learn how to cope with "the growing threat of online terrorism" do so at their peril.

A Holocaust story through a child's eyes

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

It starts with a caterpillar. A simple gift from one child to another.

It ends with a butterfly. And possibly a death.

This is how Leslie Gottlieb and Ben Shirinian plan to commemorate the Holocaust.

Gottlieb, a producer, and Shirinian, a director, are currently in pre-production for their short film, Josef and Aimée. The film, set in the south of France during the Holocaust, follows the relationship of two Jewish children taking refuge in an orphanage.

One child, Aimée, is adopted and has to leave Josef. Upon leaving, she gives him a caterpillar and makes him promise to never stop using his imagination. With the caterpillar in hand, Josef decides to leave the orphanage and find Aimée. At the end of his quest, he's captured by Nazis and is taken away in a truck.

"I always wanted to tell a story and make it appeal to kids of any age," Shirinian said. "Sometimes Holocaust stories can be hard to digest. The world we've tried to create is half reality and half a world in the child's head."

The short film, which has magical elements such as a talking caterpillar, will be shot entirely through a miniature set. The actors will be superimposed upon the set using a green screen. The film will also include animation and may end up having 3D elements.

"This type of visual execution is something children can engage in. It creates this magical world," Gottlieb said.

The short film is the first in a four-step project. Josef and Aimée will eventually become a full-length feature film, which will enter pre-production late this year or early next year.

A storybook with photos from the set and a multimedia art exhibit using video and parts of the film set are part of the project. Gottlieb and Shirinian hope to take the exhibit to museums, schools and art shows.

For both Gottlieb and Shirinian, the film's concept touches an emotional nerve. Gottlieb's grandparents survived the Holocaust, while Shirinian's grandparents were survivors of the Armenian genocide in 1915.

"The Holocaust has been so prevalent in my life," Gottlieb said, adding that this affected the movie's plot.

"We wanted to highlight that time period. We want to highlight that there were sacrifices, this was the type of experience that people had."

One of the film's main themes is innocence in the Holocaust, which is portrayed through Josef and Aimée's friendship and Josef's journey to find Aimée.

"We wanted to tell this story through the eyes of a child and to show innocence in the Shoah. Children, these things sort of happened to them [in the Holocaust]," he said.

"This film, at the forefront, is a love story between two children."

The film also concentrates on personal growth, which is represented by the caterpillar that eventually becomes a butterfly.

Because the filmmakers wanted Josef and Aimée to be educational, they set the movie in the town of Le Chambon-Sur-Lignon, where non-Jews in the village provided shelter, education and forged identification documents for 3,000 to 5,000 Jewish children.

"We're sensitive to that time period. We want to depict the orphanage as a place where Righteous Gentiles would house Jewish children," Shirinian said.

Gottlieb agreed.

"Though our story is fiction, we drew on historical context. We want it to be an educational piece for children," she said.

The original version of the film will be in French, with English subtitles, though it may be dubbed into different languages.

"We could have told it in English… we didn't think it would do it justice," Shirinian, who was born in Montreal and is bilingual, said. "[French] definitely adds a different vibe, a different tonality… I've always been drawn by French cinema."

Leslie Gottlieb, left, and Ben Shirinian are in pre-production for Josef and Aimée, a short film that follows two children's relationship in the Holocaust.

So far, Gottlieb and Shirinian have raised 70 per cent of the funds needed to finish their project. They've received a production grant from Bravo!FACT, which helps finance short films; a Toronto Arts Council media arts production grant and a National Film Board of Canada production grant.

Doc brings Hannah Senesh to life

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

At 22, Hannah Senesh, a Hungarian Jewish poet, Zionist, pioneer and resistance fighter, parachuted into Nazi-occupied Europe from Palestine to try to save Hungarian Jews.

And although she is a hero in Israel, with streets and a kibbutz named after her, her story is virtually unknown in the rest of the world.

Blessed Is the Match, an extraordinary and inspiring documentary about this Jewish "Joan of Arc," written, produced and directed by Roberta Grossman, premières on April 13 at 10 p.m. on the PBS series Independent Lens.

Through interviews, eyewitness accounts, rare family photographs, dramatic re-enactments and the writings of Senesh and her mother, Catherine, the documentary brings this moving and inspiring story to life.

Senesh was born into a well-off upper-middle-class family in Hungary in 1921. She wrote her first poem at the age of seven, when her father died suddenly of a heart attack. When she was denied entry into a literary society in high school because she was Jewish, she developed a strong Zionist yearning and applied to join an agricultural school in Palestine.

In 1939, just after the start of World War II, she arrived in Palestine and wrote, "I'm home."

Although she was well educated and clever, she became a typical pioneer on a kibbutz, eschewing her brains for brawn. But one gets the impression that Senesh was a restless spirit, full of wanderlust, and would never be happy doing one thing. When word of the Holocaust gets out in the early 1940s, Senesh felt the need to return to Europe to do something for the Jews, including her mother who was still in Hungary.

Senesh was recruited by the British and became one of a group of 37 Jews from Palestine trained to parachute in Yugoslavia to help save Hungarian Jews. But when she crossed into Nazi-occupied Hungary, she was arrested and taken to a Gestapo detention centre. Her interrogator reunited her with her mother, whom he threatened to torture in a failed attempt to make Senesh give up her radio transmitter codes.

A weighty comedy opens TJFF

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

The Toronto Jewish Film Festival kicks off its chai year on April 17 with a quirky Israeli comedy about sumo wrestling that dares ask the question: can you be fat and happy?

In A Matter of Weight, Herzl, often called Mount Herzl because he is so fat, is kicked out of a weight-loss program because, despite dieting, he keeps gaining weight.

At the Japanese restaurant where he works (the only type of restaurant in Israel he figures he won't be tempted to eat in) he catches a sumo wrestling event on television and becomes inspired.

He learns that in Japan fat men can be heroes. He convinces four of his also overweight friends from the diet program, three men and a woman, Zehava, to also quit the health club and form a sumo wrestling team.

An engaging Israeli comedy about sumo wrestlers.

Why are there no Israeli sumo wrestlers, he asks his hefty friends over a huge dinner one night? Because there are no fat people in Israel, he is told ironically.

But as you would expect, complications arise in this comedy. Herzl, 35, who lives with his mother, falls in love with Zehava. When he brings her home, his mother complains that she is too fat for him. She is worried that he is giving up on his diet, an anxiety borne from the fact that his father, her husband, also severely overweight, died when the balcony he was standing in fell under his weight.

Also, the restaurant owner, a Japanese Zionist, who serves as their sumo coach, says that women cannot be sumo wrestlers and Zehava has to leave the team.

In a world where we're bombarded with messages about being thin and beautiful, it is refreshing to see a movie where the main characters are fat people unconcerned with dieting fads, yet still determined to maintain their self-respect.

The health-club leader is portrayed as an unsympathetic dictatorial character who tells Zehava not to get pregnant because she will gain more weight and never be able to lose it.

Although a comedy, this movie has its serious side. The main characters are forced to confront themselves. Can they accept themselves and each other the way they are?

Directed by Sharon Maymon and Erez Tadmor, A Matter of Size premières at the Bloor Cinema at the Gala Opening Night April 17 at 9:15 p.m. Both directors will be in attendance. It also screens April 18 at the Cineplex Odeon Sheppard Centre at 8 p.m.

Senesh film is very moving

The dramatically re-enacted scenes in the prison building between Senesh and her mother are well acted and very moving. In captivity, she is determined to enlighten the lives of all those in prison with her, writing short stories for them to act out and teaching them Hebrew. The name of this documentary comes from one of her last poems Blessed Is the Match, which is about the power within people to bring light into the darkness.

Hannah, played by Meri Roth, left.

Senesh was tried for treason but remained defiant, reminding her judges that their day of reckoning was nearby. She was executed in Hungary shortly before the Russians liberated the country. Her body was flown to Israel in 1950, where she lay in state for three days. Her writings, letters and poems were found in a suitcase at the kibbutz where she had worked and immediately published. Some of her poems were turned into songs, including the popular Eli, Eli, recently recorded by Sophie Milman.

Blessed Is the Match taps into the Senesh family archive, which includes hundreds of unpublished letters and more than 1,300 never-before-seen photos. It includes interviews with historian Martin Gilbert, two of Senesh's nephews, and with one of the last surviving members of her volunteer group.

Blessed Is the Match is informative, moving and illuminating. It is well worth watching.

THE SOUL OF GERSHWIN AT WINTER GARDEN, MAY 1 to 9

The Soul of Gershwin, The Musical Journey of An American Klezmer is a musical examination "of how a generation of Jewish-American composers was influenced by the cross-pollinating sounds of the day; the ultimate expression of immigrant assimilation." So says a press release from the Harold Green Jewish Theatre Company, which, in association with the National Jewish Theatre, is bringing the theatrical concert to the Winter Garden Theatre in early May.

The Soul of Gershwin features three vocalists, an onstage band named Klezmerica, and 23 songs by George Gershwin, one of the most significant and popular of Jewish-American composers. Gershwin, played by Michael Paul Levin, is depicted in the midst of the bustling cultural influences – Yiddish theatre, Jewish liturgical melodies, popular tunes, folk songs, blues, jazz, opera – that he would meld into his own outstanding music, combining the techniques and forms of classical music with the stylistic nuances and techniques of popular music and jazz.

Selections include Swanee, Rhapsody in Blue, Fascinating Rhythm, The Man I Love, Foggy Day, Embraceable You, pieces from Porgy and Bess, and more. $43 to $78. Winter Garden Theatre, 189 Yonge St. May 1 to 9. 416-872-5555, www.ticketmaster.ca

More Gershwin: Those whose appetites for Gershwin are not sated by the above fare at the Winter Garden may enjoy Love Is Here to Stay: Music to Honour George Gershwin, a performance by the Oriana Women's Choir. $25, $20, $10. Grace Church-on-the-Hill, 300 Lonsdale Rd. Saturday, May 8, 8 p.m. 416-236-0948.

Stars on Spadina*: Some of Toronto's brightest talent pay tribute to the Y at Bloor and Spadina and the contribution it has made to the cultural evolution of downtown Toronto. Hosted by Tom Allen, directed by Ted Dykstra, and featuring Andrew Craig, George Sue-Ping, Hilario Duran, Julie Michels, Kellylee Evans, Melanie Doane, Micah Barnes, Real Divas and Sophie Milman. $180 includes show, live auction, and post-show dessert reception. The Ask brings back old-style Jewish humour

By MARISSA BROSTOFF
Tablet Features

Whither the shlemiel?

According to a smart and much-discussed New York Magazine article last May, American Jewish prosperity has all but killed off the "neurotic, depressive, abrasive, excluded" anti-heroes that once animated a comedic tradition running from Groucho Marx to Woody Allen.

Larry David, entertainment critic Mark Harris argued in his essay, is keeping their brand of humor on a ventilator, introducing the shlemiel and his sidekicks to "a generation to whom it's now almost completely foreign."

What Harris did not take into account was that young Jews born to privilege, like other Americans their age, are facing the very real prospect that they will never be as affluent as their parents. Praise God for the tanking economy: at least in the hands of novelist Sam Lipsyte, old-school Jewish humour has come back.

Lipsyte's satirical novel The Ask (FSG Adult), released in March, concerns the transformation of Milo Burke, an overeducated, underemployed wannabe art star, into a truly down-at-the-heels schmo.

We first meet Milo as a man in socioeconomic limbo: In early middle age, with a wife and a young son, he has a "good sh---y job" in the development office of a so-so university but still dreams of becoming a great painter; he is poorer than he was growing up but of a higher social class than his neighbours in Astoria, Queens. As a result, he has contracted an au courant malady: a case of white liberal guilt exacerbated by the dread that the privilege he loathes himself for is about to be taken away.

Milo's condition deteriorates significantly after he is fired, for lashing out at a "trustafarian" (from trust fund and rastafarian, a young person from a wealthy background whose trust fund enables him or her to reject conventional attitudes to work, dress, etc.) art student, only to be rehired on the condition that he can coax a major donation from Purdy Stuart, a former college friend and now a sleazy millionaire who needs him for a job just slightly less compromising than that of a Mafia bagman.

All this is quite grim, though hilarious in Lipsyte's telling, but there's also a redemptive aspect to the novel that's easy to overlook. When Milo slips down the class ladder, something is waiting for him at the bottom: an ethnic identity that had eluded him when he was a just-average hipster. By the end of the book, he is a grade-A shlemiel.

Milo is half-Jewish – on the side that halachically counts – but he primarily identifies, at the outset of his unfortunate journey, as a wannabe art star, which in his world amounts to a demographic category. Newly fired, he spends his days wandering the streets of Astoria and, employing the classic bohemian inversion of "there goes the neighbourhood," he worries that people just like himself will move in and ruin its heartening mixed-income multiculturalism.

Milo's shame-faced identification as the aggressor keeps his own ethnic affinities at arm's length.

"I never said gypped, or Indian giver, or paddy wagon, or accused anyone of welshing on a bet," he reflects wistfully on the sincerity of his own liberalism. "I never even called myself a yid with that tribal swagger I envied in others, though I had a right, or half a right, from my mother's side."

But once Milo has been knocked from the creative class into a milieu that includes labourers, Iraq veterans and underworld types, other people start, in effect, calling him a yid and, through having to contend with the slur, he becomes one. A doltish neighbourhood carpenter offers him a deck-building gig and takes the opportunity to pitch him a concept for a reality show, predicting (wrongly), "You seem like the kind of college boy who may be a broke screw-up but is ultimately part of the vast conspiracy of movers and shakers who move and shake our society. Jewish, right?"

Soon enough, Milo is having paranoid dreams about being insulted by an anti-Semitic Benjamin Franklin and regretting his decision not to have had his son circumcised.

What's funny about professional shlemiels from Groucho to Woody is their insistent and absurd contrariness in the face of the obvious bounds imposed on them ("I would never join a club that would accept me as a member").

Left by his wife, the anchor of his shaky existence, Milo finally reaches the sublime heights of negation mastered by his comic predecessors. He comes to take a certain pride in his Jewishness, if for no reason than to mock those real and imagined enemies who see him simply as a yid.

"Come kill me as a Jew, flog me to death in a desert quarry, bayonet me in the Pale, gas me in your Polish camp, behead me on your camcorder, I still would not believe," he says. "To me that was the true test of courage: to not submit to the faith they assume you possess and will kill you for."

It is in this quixotic spirit that Milo ends up, despite himself, what he always kind of wanted to be: an unapologetically bitter, authentically ethnic guy with no more need to worry that he is gentrifying Queens.

With The Ask, Lipsyte surely wins this month's, if not this year's award, for deftest reworking of this tragicomic, supposedly superannuated comic material, but he's not the only one who still finds it funny.

It appears in a different form in the film Greenberg – the latest from director Noah Baumbach, who at 40 is just a year younger than Lipsyte – which is playing now.

Like The Ask, Greenberg is a sharply attuned comedy of social class, though in this case, the shlemiel at its centre is Roger Greenberg, a middle-aged, emotionally disturbed scion of a wealthy Los Angeles family (played by Ben Stiller) who has an affair with his brother's personal assistant (Greta Gerwig).

Woody Allen fans will notice nods to Annie Hall in a moment when Stiller becomes momentarily indistinguishable from a crowd of Chassidim, and in Gerwig's charming but genuinely awkward character who, like Annie, shyly sings at a local nightclub. But beyond these references, there is little overt Jewishness in Greenberg, save for an early scene when Roger's Semitic looks are mentioned in jest by a fellow guest at a pool party.

"I'm not even… I'm only half," Roger protests.

"You look full," the guest says.

"That's not what I usually get," Roger says. "People think I look Italian. And since my mom is Protestant, I'm actually not Jewish at all."

The joke's on Roger – not just in this scene, which ends with his interlocutor mimicking his expressive hand gestures – but in the entire movie because Baumbach has given his film such an unavoidably Jewish title. This is slightly cruel, given that Roger can't answer back, but it's a brilliant deconstruction of the Jewish joke par excellence: Greenberg, one assumes, wouldn't want to be in a movie that would accept his name as its title.

The shlemiel is alive and not too well, which is just the way he should be.

Gerskup assumes position with Maccabi World Union

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Allen Gerskup has been involved with the Maccabi movement pretty much since 1985, when he was manager of the Canadian softball team that came home from Israel with a silver medal.

Since then, he's headed the national athletic committee and served as president of Maccabi Canada.

Last week, he was named to a new post in the Maccabi universe when he was elected vice-president of the Maccabi World Union (MWU), the governing body for the international Maccabi movement.

Four years as national president can be a grind, and he admits he's ready for a change of scenery.

His position as president of Maccabi Canada has been assumed by Toronto physician Tom Bacher.

"Needless to say, I was quite honoured to be asked to run for vice-president of MWU," he said in an interview in his Toronto office. "I felt very flattered."

Over the years, Gerskup has made many friends in the Maccabi world. He's attended pretty much every international congress and plenary since the early 1990s, and "I know 90 per cent of the people personally," he said.

Very few Canadians have served on the MWU executive committee, but Gerskup said "I've been pushing for four years that Canada needs more recognition, and they agreed that Canada needs a place at the table."

Allen Gerskup

Maccabi Canada has a reputation as "good team players," as reflected in the hard work of former president Roy Salomon, who also co-chaired Maccabi North America, in trying to resolve differences between MWU and Maccabi Australia after the tragic bridge collapse at the 1997 Maccabiah Games that killed four Australians.

In his new position, Gerskup expects "to be in charge of international sports, to be the president's eyes and ears at all the regional games, to promote bilateral games between members and to encourage more Maccabi activities between Maccabiahs."

The Maccabiah Games are the showcase event of the international Maccabi movement, held every four years in Israel. Thousands of athletes from dozens of nations attend. But in between, a number of lesser-known sporting competitions have been held, including the Pan Am Maccabiah, a European games and now an Australian-Maccabi sponsored event.

In addition, there is the JCC youth Maccabi every August that brings teenagers from across North America to (most often) three North American venues.

Gerskup said there's room for even more competitions, such as a golf tournament between three or four countries; an invitational basketball competition with a limited number of entries, or even a hockey tournament.

"That would keep the Maccabi name in front of everybody and keep it going, rather than just come to people every four years," he said.

A point of pride for Gerskup is that during his four-year tenure as president, Maccabi Canada sent teams to all the existing regional competitions – to Buenos Aires, Rome, Israel and Australia.

Maccabi sports competitions seems to have struck a chord among young Canadian Jewish athletes. Last year, prior to the 18th Maccabiah Games, some 2,200 applications were received for positions on the Canadian team. In the end, more than 400 athletes and 130 support staff represented Canada in Israel.

A fundraising infrastructure, which seems to kick in every four years, managed to raise $4.5 million for the team, even though athletes were also responsible to a large extent for financing their own trips to the Games.

During his tenure as head of Maccabi Canada, Gerskup promoted increased participation of women athletes. In 2009, the most recent Games, Team Canada featured women's teams in soccer, softball, volleyball, cycling, fencing, tennis, triathlon and junior soccer. Female athletes also participated in karate, gymnastics, squash, swimming and golf.

Gerskup still smiles at the memory of the junior soccer girls defeating the heavily favoured Americans to capture the gold medal.

In all, Canada won 12 gold, 14 silver and 37 bronze medals at the 18th Games, finishing behind only Israel and the United States.

While the overall results were gratifying, the Maccabiah did not unfold for the Canadians without incident. One lowpoint of his tenure was the problem of inadequate facilities and food in the junior village. Parents, contacted by their kids by cellphone, were irate, complaining about unsanitary conditions, dirty tap water and inadequate meals.

"It happened. We made the best of it," Gerskup said. "We apologized to our supporters," although he pointed out nearly 40 per cent of the youth village was unaffected.

About 170 people were accommodated at the youth facility, and "you can't just pick up and leave" in the middle of the summer when all nearby hotels are booked, he said.

Though it preceded his role as president, the death of longtime Maccabi official Bernie Offstein hit close to home and was another low point. Offstein, along with Salomon, were his mentors. "I relied on those guys," whom he credits with creating the foundation of Maccabi Canada "block by block."

Another difficult period that occurred when he was national athletic director, charged with assembling the team, took place in the aftermath of the Palestinian intifidah. The Maccabiah Games were scheduled to proceed when it appeared no place in Israel was safe. Organizers had to determine whether to go ahead with the event or not.

Gerskup was part of the faction that maintained Canada should be present, regardless of the risk. He estimates there was a 50-50 split among athletes and their families whether to go.

Maccabi Canada was likewise split on the issue and voted 4-3 not to attend. However, when the U.S. Maccabi organization changed its position and announced it would go, Maccabi Canada held another vote and this time the margin was 4-3 to attend.

"In retrospect, it was the right thing to do," Gerskup said. "If we love Israel so much, we have to support them, even if it's just by going and being there."

If I can make it here…

NEW TO CANADA
By NINA SHENHAV

I don't know if I've mentioned it, but I'm an actress. If you're one of those people who don't need to blink, you may have spotted me in some budget-challenged productions.

I have what it takes: a hunger for strangers' admiration, so I think it's about time that I "make it here."

I head to a career consultant. She browses through my résumé with a serious look. "I see that in Israel you performed both on TV and in theatre. You realize, of course, that your achievements were not, how shall I put it gently, in English?"

I try to explain to her that the love of art is universal, but I don't know enough words in English, so she doesn't get it.

We look at each other for a long time (I'm trying my Greek-tragedy-hero look), then she says coldly: "Take these forms." (Am I losing it with my Greek thing?)

I gaze at the forms, which list all kinds of courses: computers (c'mon!), accounting (a shiver goes down my spine), bankers (Mommy!), carpentry (see you in heaven, fingers!), and for a grand finale, paving plus mixing cement.

"Sounds like fun," I begin. (Think Jennifer Aniston as Rachel, after she breaks up with what's-his-face, Ross.)

"But let's try something else. For instance, I don't mind starting with a supporting role as a mute in a small TV show," I say. (Think Jennifer Aniston after she met Brad.)

She says nothing, so I add quickly, "Or how about theatre? A title role isn't necessary. I'm even willing to star in a low-budget Canadian sitcom as a deaf person." (Think Jennifer after Brad met Angie.)

She takes two forms out of her drawer and hands them to me. "Here, take these. Go volunteer at the theatre," she says curtly as I bound happily from her office.

"Volunteering?" Meir asks, checking out the form.

"Yeah. Just think of the potential. I'm gonna be famous! Children will ask for my autograph!"

Meir glances at the other form. "And what's this?" he asks, then reads aloud: "Training in fish skinning. Guaranteed employment." I look at my shoes. "You might consider that one, too," he adds.

I return to the consultant. "How much… how much do they pay for that fish thing?" I stammer.

"They teach you an occupation. You don't expect them to talk money right away, do you?"

I give her the Jennifer-after-the-divorce-was-finalized look, so she adds softly, "You can even get up to eight bucks an hour."

Despite of the financial temptation, I decide to pass on the fish and try volunteering at the theatre.

I head out to meet the theatre manager (who calls himself "stage manager"). The manager looks very tired for his, say, 17 years. "You see," I say to the teen, "I don't get money, so I'll accept only lead roles. I don't perform on Shabbat. Also, my meals should be of high quality and kosher, and the male lead must be gorgeous. Oh, and the obvious – my lines must be the most passionate. Do we have an understanding?"

The theatre manager laughs in admiration: "Gosh you're good. The way you fell into the diva's role was amazing!

"There," he says, pointing to the stage entrance. "You enter from there and move away that bench in the third scene. In the 15th scene, you lug back two armchairs and that table. Sometimes you'll have to lug small chests, and, naturally, you'll clean up after every show."

Hey, at least I'm on stage, aren't I?

Flatten your belly and relieve back pain

FITNESS CORNER
By FELYCE ZOMPARELLI

Diastasis recti. You've probably never heard of it, yet it affects about 40 per cent of pregnant women and five per cent of men. Most people don't even know they have it, so why is it important?

Diastasis is a tear in the rectus abdominals at the weakest point of the linea alba, or the belly button. It's usually caused by a continuous forceful forward movement or pressure on the abdominal area, such as a growing fetus, incorrect abdominal crunches, pilates 100s, moving heavy equipment, repeatedly getting up and down incorrectly or an excessive beer belly. This kind of separation weakens the support system for the back, which can lead to a hernia.

Like a hernia, a diastasis won't heal on its own, and it can become larger. The tear allows your internal organs to protrude forward, giving the appearance of a full belly and causing unexplainable back pain. It's the reason why most woman can't get a flat stomach after pregnancy, no matter how many abdominal crunches they do.

In fact, doing exercises such as the plank, abdominal crunches or oblique crunches before the tear is healed can cause the tear to increase. A study done at Columbia University in 2001 found that three simple exercises – belly breathing, the elevator and belly contractions – done for 2-1/2 minutes daily repaired the tear by pulling the rectus abdominals back together and eliminated back pain by strengthening the transverse muscle.

The transverse muscle is the deepest, largest and most important muscle of your core. It supports the lumbar spine and is involved in all forward and backward movements of the torso. Try to draw your belly button to your spine and hold it there for 30 seconds, while breathing.

I started doing these three exercises and noticed a huge difference in just three days. So I gave them to a client who recently had a hysterectomy that left her with bloating and numbness in the lower belly. In three days the bloating was gone. In seven days, she started to get feeling back.

Ode to empty nesters

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

Many of my contemporaries are or have become empty nesters of late. I wrote this fictional piece in their honour.

URBAN WRITER

For 25 years, I hadn't known there were creaks in our home. The deafening noise of children playing and kids growing masked them.

I am an empty nester and I am lost. Recently my daughter, the last of five children, started university in London, Ont. My husband and I helped her set up the place she rented. We laughed the whole way there.

Coming back was different though.

Somehow in our small hatchback, we found our own corners as soon as we hit the Highway 401 and mostly stayed there for what seemed like hours. Our little girl was not in the back seat. She would be away for four years and likely would never move back into our home. I couldn't stop crying.

We drove up the driveway, and my husband turned the ignition off. The car rolled slightly and then stopped abruptly when he pulled the emergency brake. I looked at him, wondering if he was OK.

He was crying. Tears were rolling down his cheeks. I hadn't seen him cry for many years, actually since his father's shivah. As it was so uncommon to see that side of him, I shivered a bit and coldness set in at not feeling so safe any longer.

I opened the car door and stepped out. I was still in my corner, and in some way, some strange way, I resented my husband.

"Let's have another child," I had said to him when our youngest had turned three. "Five is not a lot you know. The Goldmans have eight children and were grandparents when they had their last one."

"It's smart," I said, "so we'll never be alone."

My husband looked at me with unhappiness in his eyes and said, "Alone? We'll have each other."

I was 50 and I wanted to make another child. I didn't want the two of us to be alone, even though we had tickets for the theatre and Leafs and Raptors games, and a membership to Beth Torah Congregation. It wasn't enough though. I am a mother and I want so badly to nurture, and it's not enough from an occasional distance.

My husband got out of the car and I asked, "Why are you crying? Isn't this what you always wanted?"

He responded that it was, but he never realized that he actually dreaded this moment.

"I was so tired of driving the boys to their hockey games, bar mitzvah lessons and to concerts," he continued.

"I couldn't wait to go to bed when I wanted, not having to wait up for the girls, and to wake up later, instead of having to prepare breakfast for everyone on the weekends."

He continued that he was too young to be an empty nester and the next stop was being a grandparent, something that made him feel decrepit.

The next day, our rabbi commiserated with us, but he was too young to appreciate what we were going through. His oldest was six. We called our friends who had become empty nesters two years earlier and they were busy playing golf. A week, month, year went by. Pesach came, and the family was together, and eight days later they were gone.

A few years passed. Our daughter got married, then she got divorced. Then she moved back home. We've asked her to shovel the snow, hoping she would get the point. She's hasn't. The house seems so terribly full.

WELCOME TO THE

18TH ANNUAL TORONTO JEWISH FILM FESTIVAL

In the Jewish tradition, "l'Chaim" is a toast "to life." The numeric value of the Hebrew letters forming the word "chai" is 18, so this is a very meaningful birthday for TJFF. It's a time to celebrate our past and salute the future.

The special sidebar series this year is People of the Comic Book: The Creators of Superheroes, Graphic Novels & Toons. Jews basically invented the comic book: Superman, Batman, Spiderman ... these and many other iconic superheroes were created by Jewish artists. The graphic novel, and a significant part of early animation, were also largely a Jewish creation. Through films and special events, People of the Comic Book celebrates the Jewish pioneers and creators of comic art.

This year's Festival features films from 18 countries. Among them are The Loners, Renen Schorr's film about two Israeli soldiers who bring an entire army base to a standstill, and Simon Konianski, a quirky road movie from Belgium. The Festival is honoured to screen the North American Premiere of the newly restored documentary Nuremberg: Its Lesson for Today. There are also documentary profiles of some truly remarkable personalities, ranging from filmmaker Claude Lanzmann to Baroness Pannonica Rothschild, jazz lover and muse of Thelonious Monk.

Still the best ticket in town, the TJFF has something for everyone. Covering the city, we now screen in four venues: the Bloor Cinema, the Al Green Theatre, the Cineplex Odeon Sheppard Centre Cinemas and, starting this year, the SilverCity Richmond Hill Cinemas, which will further serve audiences in the northern part of Toronto. For full descriptions of the films, as well as times and venues, and, most importantly, to book your tickets, go to our website at tjff.com.

SPECIAL PRESENTATION

NUREMBERG: ITS LESSON FOR TODAY (1948) [The 2009 Schulberg/Waletzky Restoration]

NORTH AMERICAN PREMIERE
USA/GERMANY 1948/2009, 80 MIN
WRITER/DIRECTOR: STUART SCHULBERG
RESTORATION CREATED BY: SANDRA SCHULBERG & JOSH WALETZKY

Originally produced in 1948, and subsequently suppressed by the U.S. government, the English-language version of Nuremberg was never completed, and the original picture negative and sound elements were lost or destroyed. One of the greatest courtroom dramas in history, Nuremberg illustrates how four international prosecutors built their case against the top Nazi war criminals during a trial that lasted from November 20, 1945 to October 1, 1946. The film follows the structure of the four counts of indictment, interwoven with the Nazis' own documentation and propaganda films presented as evidence at the trial, building to a climax with the judges' chilling verdicts. Nuremberg is an incredible piece of cinematic history that has been meticulously restored. Not to be missed. Warning: Graphic archival footage.

From sorrow to celebration

The transition in Israel from Yom Hazikaron (Memorial Day) to Yom Ha'atzmaut (Independence Day) is stark, yet moving. At left, Israeli soldiers attend a memorial ceremony on the Mount of Olives in Jerusalem. Right, a young girl celebrates Independence Day with a doll of David Ben-Gurion, Israel's first prime minister. Please see related story on page 43.

Western Wall triggers ad ban in U.K.

JTA

LONDON — An advertisement for travel to Israel was banned in Britain as misleading for showing sites that included the Western Wall.

The ad, part of an Israeli Government Tourist Office campaign, said that a tourist could "travel the entire length of Israel in six hours," and showed pictures of attractions such as the Western Wall and the Dome of the Rock.

The British Advertising Standards Authority received a complaint claiming that the advertising, which appeared in publications and on posters, was misleading since the Western Wall and the Dome of the Rock are located in eastern Jerusalem and are "part of the occupied territories."

The authority claimed that readers of the ad were likely to assume that all the places featured in the ad were within the State of Israel.

"The status of the occupied territory of the West Bank [is] the subject of much international dispute, and because we considered that the ad implied that the part of east Jerusalem featured in the image was part of the State of Israel, we concluded that the ad was likely to mislead," the Advertising Standards Authority said.

The News in Brief

Canada

Rapist Gets 8 Years

TORONTO — A former York University student who returned to campus in September 2007 and raped two women in their Vanier College residence rooms received eight years in jail for the crimes last week. Daniel Katsnelson, 27, who graduated from York in 2006, pleaded guilty to the rapes in January. The Crown had sought a 10-year sentence, while the defence asked for five years. Katsnelson's longtime friend, Justin Connort, pleaded guilty in 2008 to one count of sexual assault and received three years in jail.

Munks Give Gift

TORONTO — A $35-million gift from mining entrepreneur Peter Munk and his wife, Melanie, to the University of Toronto – the largest in its history – will help create a new School of Global Affairs. U of T said last week. The school will be set up with the help of a $25-million provincial grant and incorporate U of T's Munk Centre for International Studies, established 10 years ago after another Munk gift.

Divestment Backed

SAN FRANCISCO — A vote to overturn the veto of an Israel divestment bill at the University of California, Berkeley has attracted high-profile supporters. South African Archbishop Desmond Tutu and author Naomi Klein have spoken out in favour of the university divestment bill, which was vetoed last month by the president of Berkeley's student association. A vote to overturn the veto was set for this week. The bill passed 16-4 in the student senate, but some senators were said to be reconsidering their vote. A two-thirds majority is required to overturn the veto.

Church Ruled OK

CHICAGO — A Chicago court ruled that a father can take his Jewish daughter to church. A judge who had previously denied Joseph Reyes permission to take his daughter, 3, to Easter services, said in a divorce ruling April 13 that he could take the girl to church during his visitation times, which include Christmas and Easter. The judge reportedly said her decision was based on "the best interest of the child." Joseph Reyes made headlines when he took his daughter to church and had her baptized, despite a restraining order filed by his estranged wife that barred him from exposing the girl to faiths other than Judaism.

Demjanjuk calls war crimes trial 'torture'

MUNICH — John Demjanjuk addressed the court at his German war crimes trial for the first time last week, expressing anger at the proceedings.

In an April 13 statement read by his lawyer in the Munich court, Demjanjuk, 90, called the trial "torture." He was charged in December 2009 as an accessory to the murder of 29,700 Jews at the Sobibor death camp in Poland in 1943. The trial is expected to conclude this summer.

Demjanjuk said he was "forcibly deported" from the United States last year to face a "false accusation of accomplice to murder" after "30 years of legal persecution in Israel, the United States and Poland." He blamed Jewish groups, namely the World Jewish Congress and the Simon Wiesenthal Center, for levelling false charges against him.

He said Germany is trying to "turn a prisoner of war into a war criminal." He says he was a Red Army soldier taken prisoner by the Nazis and blamed Germany "for using violence and threats of execution to force thousands upon thousands to work in perverse mass-extermination camps." He didn't say whether he worked in one of these camps, as the prosecution maintains.

An Israeli death sentence against he Ukraine-born Demjanjuk was overturned after the Supreme Court found reasonable doubt he was a guard at Treblinka.

Students present Schalit petition to Parliament

Conservative MP acts on behalf of high schoolers

By CARA STERN
Special to The CJN

OTTAWA — Jewish high school students presented a petition to Parliament last week urging the federal government to help secure the freedom of kidnapped soldier Gilad Schalit and other missing Israeli servicemen.

The petition has about 250 signatures from community members of many different faiths. Members of a Torah High class, in which public high school students learn about Judaism, began collecting the signatures three years ago, said Bram Bregman, executive director of NCSY Ottawa, which runs Torah High.

The teens also collected messages of support for Schalit's family, he said.

Since Hamas kidnapped him on Israeli territory in 2006, Schalit has been held hostage in the Gaza Strip.

Pierre Poilievre, Conservative MP for the riding of Nepean-Carleton riding in Ottawa, presented the petition to the House of Commons on April 14 on behalf of the students.

"It was an opportunity to raise the important concern of missing Israeli soldiers and to highlight the ongoing deplorable behaviour of Hezbollah and terrorist groups like it," he said.

But it was also a way to represent the voices of everyday Canadians who demand action, he added.

Bregman said it's important to show the government that citizens support Schalit.

An outstanding woman of history

From the editor's desk...

One need not be a newshound – someone whose nose is buried in the pages of the newspaper or whose eyes are transfixed onto the hypnotic white light of the computer screen – to have noticed that these days, many individuals, organizations and alas, even nation states, are trying to alter and in some cases obliterate Jewish history.

For example, in this week's issue alone of The CJN (see pages 1 and 8), we carry the story of Britain's Advertising Standards Agency prohibiting the government of Israel from using a tourism poster that includes a photo of the Western Wall. The real purpose of the prohibition, we can all agree, is to lend support to the view of history propagated by Israel's enemies that the Western Wall, the Old City and east Jerusalem should not be associated with the Jewish state.

By the same token, one need not be a devotee of Jewish tradition to know that the single most important guarantor of the perpetuity of Jewish history is the nurturing and sustaining of our collective memory.

We have just emerged from a period of time and a series of observances that have been the equivalent of a gale-force wind on a full-mast sail through the open seas and channels of Jewish history.

Starting in the middle of the month of Nisan with the holiday of Pesach, 12 days later with Yom Hashoah v'Hagvurah, and then seven days after that, just last week, with Yom Hazikaron and Yom Ha'atzmaut, we have all recently breathed the same invigorating, salty air of our past.

If we are to build a future, we must know our past. If we are to assert our rights as a people, we must know our history. For it is that shared and common history that helps mould a sense of peoplehood and helps us respond to the calumnious suggestion that the Western Wall is illegally occupied by Israel.

Hence, the story last week in this space about the bravery of the people of Kibbutz Gesher during Israel's War of Independence.

Hence, the story this week about a woman who lived some 400 years before Israel's War of Independence, who dedicated her entire adult life to rescuing Jews in distress, who stood shoulder to shoulder with kings and rulers, and who has been described as the first "modern" Zionist.

Dona Gracia Nasi was born in Lisbon, Portugal, in 1510 into the Miguis family of Conversos (New Christians). She was given the name Beatrice de Luna. Early on in her life, her parents told her the truth of her Jewish past and shared with her the secret of their Jewish present. Her real name was Hannah Nasi.

She married Francisco Mendez, a wealthy banker, whose real name was Tzemach Benvenisti. To avoid the encroaching tentacles of the Inquisition the couple fled to London and then to Antwerp. Hanna arrived in Antwerp as Dona Gracia.

She became a widow at the age of 25 and inherited her deceased husband's bank and his banking fortune. But her husband's enemies plotted against her and against her control of the bank. She outwitted the plotters.

In her excellent biography of Dona Gracia, The Woman Who Defied Kings, Andrée Aelion Brooks writes, "While steering Francisco's sprawling business interests, she would defy her enemies by spending most of her fortune on a humanitarian enterprise that would engross her more than the profitable royal loans, spice monopolies, syndications and currency arbitrage favoured by her husband.

"She would become the self-appointed protector and political liaison for [the Inquisition's] targets: the Conversos. These were Spanish and Portuguese Jews who, like her own family, had been forcibly converted to Catholicism."

As the head of the Mendez bank and a secret, trans-national network for the rescue of Jews, she eventually settled in the capital of the Ottoman Empire, Kushta (Istanbul as it would later become known). Before she arrived in Kushta, however, she travelled through and lived in Venice, Ferrara, Ancona, Ragussa (later Dubrovnik) and finally Thessalonica in Greece.

While she lived in Turkey, it was Dona Gracia's ambition to bring Jews to the Holy Land and specifically to the city of Tiberius on the shores of the Sea of Galilee.

Visitors to Tiberius today can learn first hand of the life and exploits of this remarkable Jewish woman at the The House of Dona Gracia Hotel-Museum (at Rehov Haprachim 3). Each room in the museum is named after a city where Dona Gracia spent part of her life.

Tzvi Schaick is the general manager and curator of the museum. Irit Ahdoot, the marketing and public relations manager, told The CJN during a visit there in February that "the aim of the hotel-museum is to teach visitors about the courage, wisdom and leadership of Jewish women throughout our history. We are trying to teach people to be proud Jews. We have had outstanding role models throughout our history. Being Jewish is a wonderful thing."

I completely agree. In November, there will be celebrations in Israel marking the 500th anniversary of Dona Gracia's birth. For more information about the hotel-museum and about Dona Gracia, go to www.donagracia.com.

Where dishonesty trumps fair play

Last week, a regulatory agency of the British government decided that within the borders of the United Kingdom, the Israel Government Tourism Office (IGTO) is not allowed to show a photo of the Western Wall in an effort to call visitors to the Jewish state.

Seeing a photo of the Western Wall in the Old City of Jerusalem part of an Israel tourism ad attached to it, an irate consumer complained to the government that the advertisement was a fraud upon the British public, because it implied that the Western Wall is within the State of Israel.

The Advertising Standard Agency in London ruled that it "considered that readers were likely to understand that the places featured in the itinerary were all within the State of Israel… We understood, however, that the status of the occupied territory of the West Bank was the subject of much international dispute, and because we considered that the ad implied that the part of east Jerusalem featured in the image was part of the State of Israel, we concluded that the ad was likely to mislead."

As a result, the agency ruled that the advertising was false and that the IGTO advertisement had breached the agency's guidelines on truthfulness. The ad was banned, and the agency further gloated: "We told IGTO not to imply that places in the occupied territories were part of the State of Israel."

Israel's tourism officials objected to the ruling, as did the chief rabbi of the Western Wall, Rabbi Shmuel Rabinovitch, and the mayor of Jerusalem, Nir Barkat. The Board of Deputies of British Jews called the agency's ruling absurd.

The inclusion of the photo of the Western Wall may indeed imply that it is part of Israel. For all but the haters of Israel, the relationship of the Western Wall to the State of Israel is not a matter of even the slightest controversy. But that was clearly not the purpose of the ad. The ad was patently, exclusively about attracting visitors. The image of the Wall was joined with two other meaningful images – of the sand and sun of Tel Aviv – designed to entice tourists to Israel.

By visiting Israel, one can visit the Western Wall. That is a self-contained, factually true statement. That was the extent and import of the image of the Western Wall in the tourism ad. The legal "dispute" over the Wall is utterly irrelevant to the ad.

The ruling by the British regulatory agency was a transparently cynical effort to convert a matter of tourism into a matter of polemics and politics, and thus, is further proof that the much-vaunted sense of fair play for which the British had always patted themselves on the back is a myth.

In Great Britain, fair play has surrendered to dishonesty. And all the more shame for it.

Retired autoworker John Demjanjuk, 65, was ordered extradited to Israel from his home in suburban Cleveland for allegedly being a guard at the Treblinka concentration camp during the Holocaust and being complicit in the murder of thousands of Jews. The Ukraine-born Demjanjuk denied being a Treblinka guard and said he was captured by the Germans and held prisoner. He denied helping the Nazis.

Jews should stop university contributions

As a reader of The CJN, I read and hear of problems at Canadian universities. Jewish students can't go about their education without being the subject of hate by groups that use them to attack the State of Israel.

For many years, Jewish individuals and groups have donated money to erect buildings on Canadian university campuses as a way of saying thank you for the chance to get an education and be part of this great country. Doctors, lawyers, engineers, etc. have made contributions to this country and its universities, and some of them fought and died for this country in war. To have their grandchildren subjected to hate mongering and anti-Semitism is painful to them.

If universities want contributions from the Jewish community, it's time the universities start looking after our children. It's time to cut off gifts of money, art, books and any other form of contribution until the problem is fixed. I, for one, am tired of the excuses that come from heads of universities who do nothing to protect Jewish groups that want to express their views and support Israel. It's time the givers had a say, not the mobs.

Peace on campus

In response to Judith Weinroth's letter "Israeli-Palestinian Peace Week?" (Letters, April 1), I wish that it were so, but the hope that an Israeli-Palestinian Peace Week at McMaster University in Hamilton could take place by next year is a delusion or a pipe dream. Israeli Apartheid Week (IAW) causes so much pain and anguish to Jewish students as well as to all those who believe that Israel has the right to exist.

The groups responsible for this hate-fest are not truly interested in anything other than spreading their lies unhindered by the facts or historic truths. These groups enjoy bringing the most contemptible of speakers to campus and, sadly, these so-called scholars are heard by far too many people. I think it's important to have hope, but peace can only be achieved on campus when the groups responsible for IAW agree to do away with this abomination. Then and only then can all sides come to the table and begin to engage in meaningful discourse.

Yes, the rise of European parties, such as Jobbik in Hungary, is worrisome for Jews and other minorities ("Rise of conservative right alarming Hungary's Jews," April 8). However, The CJN is mistaken in describing the party as being right-wing. To the extent that I was able to discern, Jobbik's economic policies are left-wing: they call for curtailing privatization and increasing nationalization.

The party's hostility to Israel is also more a sign of a left-wing party. Currently, hostility to Israel is increasingly the domain of the left. The CJN should report about such parties without labelling them as being right-wing.

My parents are Sephardi Jews from Greece and our Pesach meal consists of lamb with fresh peas ("Not all Sephardim eat rice on Pesach," April 1). According to Rabbi Herbert C. However, they do not eat rice on Passover because of the necessity of checking through the rice to make sure there is no grain mixed into it.

Remembering victims of plane crash

I was 13 years old on July 5, 1970, when my mother and two younger sisters were killed in the plane crash of Air Canada Flight 621, in a farmer's field in Brampton, Ont. The tragedy obviously shattered our lives, and unfortunately my father and grandparents never recovered.

For the sake of family members and friends of the victims – 109 people lost their lives and there were no survivors – the tragedy and location of the crash deserves to be respectfully remembered. There are plans to dedicate a memorial garden around the impact zone in Brampton. It is estimated that the completion of the garden will take up to two years.

My family, friends and I are involved in helping to organize a gathering at a Flight 621 formal dedication for the planned memorial garden in memory of the victims. Please contact me if you want more information.

Turkey walks a fine line on Iran

By YIGAL SCHLEIFER
JTA

As an American-led consensus appears to be developing around the need for a new round of sanctions to deal with Iran's nuclear program, Turkey – a U.S. ally and NATO member – is emerging as something of a wild card on the issue.

Turkish Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan has dismissed accusations that Tehran wants to develop nuclear weapons as "rumours." Also, in recent months he has focused attention on Israel's undeclared nuclear arsenal, saying it should be examined as well if Iran's nuclear program is being scrutinized.

Yet Turkey has its own concerns about the ambitions of Iran, a neighbour and regional rival.

"Turkey has been pursuing for the last six or seven years a foreign policy that would make it a regional power, and Iran is an obvious rival in that race," said Fehmi Koru, a columnist with Yeni Safak, a liberal Islamic newspaper in Turkey that is considered close to the government.

"A nuclear Iran might be more powerful than Turkey, and I don't think anyone in Ankara would like to see Iran as a nuclear power. But Iran is a close friend of Turkey and a neighbour that we haven't had a quarrel with since the 1600s. It's a delicate issue."

Where Turkey stands exactly on Iran is a matter of some concern in the pro-sanctions camp.

Aside from its strategic importance to the West, Turkey currently is one of the 10 rotating members of the UN Security Council. Five "yes" votes are needed from the council's rotating members to pass a new round of sanctions against Iran, making Turkey's position critical.

Multiple, sometimes competing factors are at play when it comes to Turkey's stance on Iran.

Relations between Iran and Turkey have improved dramatically in recent years. The ascendancy in 2002 of Turkey's Islamic-rooted Justice and Development Party, or AKP, was a key turning point. The party has pledged to pursue a regional foreign policy of "zero problems" with its neighbours.

Trade between the two countries hit an estimated $10 billion in 2009, compared to $1 billion in 2000. Iran also supplies nearly one-third of Turkey's gas supply. Turkish officials, meanwhile, were among the first and only world leaders to congratulate Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad after his controversial re-election last summer.

Koru says Erdogan has adopted the public posture of questioning Iran sanctions to keep the door open to the Iranian regime, so that Turkey can act as an interlocutor with the West. Erdogan is concerned, too, that sanctions on Iran would hit trade with Turkey particularly hard.

Other analysts see political motivations behind Erdogan's public pronouncements on Iran's nuclear program: by appearing to attack Israel and back Iran, Erdogan stands to benefit politically.

> 'I think the Americans are sick and tired of Turkey playing Iran's lawyer and bashing Israel'

"This has become an opportunity for Erdogan to essentially play a role in the Middle East by attacking Israel," said Henri Barkey, a Turkey expert at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace in Washington, D.C. "It's all part of the game to make Turkey the pre-eminent power in the region."

At this month's nuclear security summit in Washington, Erdogan again drew attention to Israel, whose relations with Turkey have been on the skids since Israel's 2009 war with Hamas in Gaza.

"We don't desire any nuclear proliferation in our region, and our policy is well known, regardless of which country has such programs," Erdogan told reporters before returning to Istanbul. "For us, it doesn't matter whether it is Israel or Iran. I will call on the international community, which is so sensitive toward Iran, to pay attention to Israel, too."

Turkish Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan and Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad at a meeting last year in Tehran.

Critics of Erdogan's approach say the Turkish leader is playing a dangerous game.

"What Erdogan is doing is not contributing to his declared aim of a nuclear-free region," said Semih Idiz, a foreign affairs columnist with the Turkish daily Milliyet. "What he is saying is being interpreted in the Middle East as that since Israel has weapons, why can't others have them? The way he is approaching the thing, he's also encouraging the weaponization of the Middle East."

Barkey says the approach ultimately may strain Ankara's relations with Washington, which would like to see Turkey deliver a tougher message to Tehran.

"I think the Americans are sick and tired of Turkey playing Iran's lawyer and bashing Israel. Whatever Obama's relations with Israel are, he doesn't need this now," Barkey said. "At some point there is going to be a bigger price here. It's going to have an impact. It's going to sour Turkish-American relations slowly, not because they are bashing Israel, but because they are favouring Iran."

Koru says that despite the public statements by Erdogan, Turkey has conveyed concerns to Iran about its suspected nuclear weapons program.

"Their policy is one of management rather than confrontation," Barkey said.

In reality, political observers say, Turkey doesn't want to see a nuclear Iran or the unravelling of its relationship with Israel.

"I see no good news coming for Turkey from a continuing Iranian nuclear program," said Ian Lesser, an expert on Turkey and Iran at the Washington-based German Marshall Fund, which promotes European-North American co-operation.

A nuclear-armed Iran, Lesser said, "will have implications for how groups under Iran's umbrella, like Hezbollah or Hamas, will behave in the region, which may not be comfortable for Turkey," he said. "I see a much more tense region with changing military balances that would not be in Turkey's favour."

World powers intensifying Iran sanctions talks

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

NEW YORK — The five permanent UN Security Council members and Germany are accelerating negotiations on a new round of sanctions against Iran over its nuclear program, UN diplomats said last week.

UN ambassadors from the United States, Britain, France, Germany, Russia and China met last Thursday and will keep meeting in the coming days and weeks, diplomats said on condition of anonymity.

"The talks are intensifying," one diplomat told Reuters. Another said the six might begin discussing the issue on an almost-daily basis as they work to prepare a draft sanctions resolution for the full 15-member Security Council.

Last Thursday's discussions followed another round of inconclusive negotiations a day earlier. China's UN envoy, Li Baodong, said afterward that the six now have "a better understanding of each other's positions."

The envoys have been discussing a U.S. draft proposal, first circulated weeks ago, that provides for a fourth round of sanctions on Iran for its refusal to stop uranium enrichment. The West accuses Tehran of seeking to produce atomic arms but Tehran says it aims only to generate electricity.

The U.S. draft proposes new curbs on Iranian banking, a full arms embargo, tougher measures against Iranian shipping, moves against members of Iran's Islamic Revolutionary Guard Corps and firms they control and a ban on new investments in Iran's energy sector.

Diplomats told Reuters last week that China's Li had indicated displeasure at the proposals affecting Iran's energy sector at a first meeting the previous week with his counterparts.

The Russians also have problems with proposals related to energy, shipping, arms and finance, western diplomats said.

Moscow and Beijing, which have close trade ties to Iran, reluctantly supported three rounds of UN sanctions against Tehran in 2006, 2007 and 2008, but worked to dilute the measures before they were approved by the Security Council. Iran is the third-largest crude oil supplier to energy-hungry China.

U.S. President Barack Obama said last month that he wanted a new Iran sanctions resolution adopted "in weeks." He raised the issue of Iran during recent bilateral meetings with Chinese President Hu Jintao and Russian President Dmitry Medvedev.

Although the U.S. and European delegations would like a resolution adopted this month, diplomats say negotiations could continue until at least June as China and Russia are expected to push to water down the proposed punitive steps before handing a draft resolution to the Security Council.

Opinions

Of wigs, hijabs, hats and niqabs

Women's head coverings are in the news. In both France and Quebec, laws have been drafted to forbid either the hijab or niqab in public situations. Why?

Norma Baumel Joseph in Montreal

We claim to adhere to principles of freedom of religion. They're inscribed in our Charter of Rights. Is it possible to deny those rights? If women wish to self-identify by covering their hair or face, how can a democracy deny them that choice?

Of course, matters of public order and/or security override individual rights. Thus, voting, border crossing or exam-taking could require facial recognition. (Fingerprinting is far more accurate, but who am I to point out security system weaknesses?)

Except, security is clearly not the issue here. This outcry is about accommodation, about accepting others' difference. If we pride ourselves on multiculturalism, how can we not accept diversity? As Jews, how can we not see that we will be the very next ones to be singled out as religiously different, and hence suspect?

The rhetoric of the legislation is laughable. The government claims that it worries about women's equality. So in its own patronizing and patriarchal way, it legislates against women's choice and forces a western pattern on women. That sure sounds like equality.

They say that women are socialized to accept coverings but they are a sign of submission and inequality. By whose definition? Can we say that we're not submissive to a western based culture that forces women to disclose themselves and unveil their hair to the "male gaze"? Women should be visible, available for men to look at. That's our cultural standard, the basis of fashion and advertisements.

If a woman says she chooses the niqab, we belittle her choice. But if she choices to wear flimsy clothing, we consider her free and chic. What crazy standards.

And while I'm on this rant, I have a question for my Jewish sisters. How is it that women from all the denominations enter the synagogue to pray without a head covering? I recognize the choice that many of us made to stop wearing a hat in public as a sign of marriage or modesty. But head coverings in Judaism have multiple meanings. Men cover their heads to pray as Jews, standing before God in humility and awe. Are women exempt? Are women not part of the covenantal community? In our search for equality is this not a necessary step to take, to cover one's head as a Jew standing in the presence of God? Shouldn't we all cover our heads when we pray?

Reconciling revenge and hope

The seders are behind us and we have (mostly) found the regular dishes and put them back in place. Each year we find new meaning in the recital of the story of our Exodus from slavery to freedom. "How were your seders? Did you learn something new?" we ask our friends.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

Thoughts linger, especially the ceremony around opening the door for Eliyahu and recital of Shfoch: "Pour out your wrath upon those who do not know you and upon the nations which do not call upon your name. For they have devoured Jacob and laid waste his dwelling place."

We curse those peoples and nations who, over the long centuries, have slaughtered our people. Yet here we are inviting Eliyahu to come in and welcoming him as the precursor of the Mashiach. How to reconcile these two elements of revenge and hope?

Moses Isserles (16th century) argued that when Jews open their doors in foreign lands to recite Shfoch, it expresses their faith that God will protect them and, quoting the song, that 'God is watching you'.

The Maharal of Prague, of Golem fame, taught that filling the cup and opening the door give concrete expression to faith in the ultimate messianic redemption.

It could be dangerous to open the door on seder night. From the 12th century on, Jews were accused of using children's blood to make matzah; pogroms erupted at Passover/Easter. Clergy and laymen would descend on the Jewish quarters with torches and clubs and lay waste to everything in their path. Pallid pleas from the papacy that the Jews needed to live in order to prove the truth of Christianity did little to stem popular ideas that Jews were the devil incarnate.

Early Haggadot apparently do not contain this passage. The open door and Shfoch recital seem to have arisen by the 1400s, after the Jews of Europe had endured several centuries of Crusades, plague, blood libel, Inquisition, expulsion, and just general mayhem for their communities. Calling down God's punishments must have been rather satisfactory to Jews who survived these destructions.

Prophet Eliyahu himself was not a meek and mild lamb. He had presided over the slaughter of the priests of Baal on Mt. Carmel and cursed King Achav and his idolatrous wife, Jezebel.

From the 10th century we have a Midrash where he appears on the eve of Pesach. Pesach itself is the holiday of redemption both from slavery and from the mundane – truly the time we look forward to the Messianic age. Putting together the appearance of Eliyahu and the persecutions of the Middle Ages, we can see how the two conflate to create an avenger, a bringer of retribution and hope at the same time.

Still, there is reluctance in these supposedly peaceful times to recite the curse in its original form. Some liberal Haggadot rewrite it. But as long as there are suicide bombers, hate mail, neo-Nazi attacks, the murder of Jews simply for being Jews, it is there to remind us of times when Jewish lives were worthless -- indeed, worth less than nothing.

Sometimes we need to remind ourselves that (a) there is evil in this world and (b) we need to, must do something about it.

Reciting the curse, while thinking of Eliyahu as a symbol of a better future, I feel at once angry, lusting for revenge, while at the same time hoping for a better world.

Maybe that is how we are supposed to react.

Let's recall the full passage upon which the appointment of Eliyahu as Messianic precursor is based: " Behold, I send you Eliyahu the prophet before the great and awesome day of the Lord." That day will be "nora" – in the JPS translation, "fearful".

"He shall reconcile parents with children and children with their parents so that, when I come, I do not strike the whole land with utter destruction." Reconciliation is a powerful thing; can we achieve it?

Indeed, the messianic hope should fill us with awe and fear, since we ourselves are ultimately responsible for repairing this world.

Power couple make a difference

From time to time, this column attempts to share with Canada's Jewish community a portrait of some of its most distinguished members – those who have contributed significantly to the Jewish community and the community at large. Eric and Elexis Schloss are two such Edmontonians.

Gerald L. Gall in Edmonton

This power couple, a dynamic team of doers and givers, have demonstrated, by their deeds, their dedication to the communities they cherish.

Eric is a dermatologist who has blended his busy medical practice with the needs of Edmonton, Canadian and world Jewry. For example, he has served as chair of the Jewish National Fund in Edmonton, the Western Canadian Zionist Federation and the Edmonton United Jewish Appeal. He was the co-chair of the local State of Israel Bond Committee and has been active in his synagogue, Congregation Beth Israel, serving in many positions, including president.

I worked with Eric when he was the chair of the Edmonton Canada-Israel Committee, and I found him to be an effective and dedicated leader. He also served as the vice-president of the Edmonton Jewish Community Council and was active with the local Jewish Archives and Historical Society. This is just a partial list of his involvement with the Jewish community, but his work has extended beyond that.

Eric has maintained an active interest in the affairs of the University of Alberta, serving as a member of the Arts Development Council of the university's faculty of arts and a member of the university's annual human rights lectureship committee.

Most recently, Eric made a generous donation to the Canadian Literature Centre – a centre he helped establish at the University of Alberta. He contributed a collection of more than 30,000 rare books, primarily first editions from a wide variety of genres, to the centre.

But, as noted at the beginning of this article, Eric is part of a dynamic team. His wife, Elexis, has made significant contributions to society and the various communities she serves.

Elexis' creative capacities include her work as an interior designer, clothes designer and watercolour artist. She added to the vitality of this city's art community through service on the boards of the Provincial Museum of Alberta, the Edmonton Art Gallery and the city's largest theatre, the Citadel Theatre. She also shared her talents when she chaired the committee overseeing the design and construction of the beautiful new building for Congregation Beth Israel.

In her service to community, she has promoted heart-disease research and provided hot meals for children in need. She is also involved in assisting and promoting community living for people with disabilities; supporting immigrant woman and campaigning for breast cancer research. She has worked on behalf of those affected by HIV/AIDS here in Edmonton, as well as at an HIV clinic in Accra, Ghana. Eric also provided community service in Accra through volunteer medical instruction.

Elexis' tireless energy has significantly benefited Edmonton's Jewish community. She has served as co-chair of the Jewish National Fund and co-president of Canadian Friends of Hebrew University. She has been named a life member of Hadassah, and through her work with the aboriginal community, in 2008, Elexis was designated an elder by the Aboriginal Women's Profession Association.

Elexis has been the recipient of several other honours over the years, including the Edmonton Journal Woman Entrepreneur of the Year and the Rotary Club Integrity Award. She was also awarded an honorary diploma by MacEwan University.

As impressive as their contributions and awards indicate, anyone having the pleasure of meeting Eric and Elexis will find this unique team to be unassuming, modest and humble. It's a delight to share time with them.

They have received many honours, including being named as the honorees at the 1995 Edmonton Negev Dinner. In addition, they were both recipients of the Queen Elizabeth II Golden Jubilee Medal and the Alberta Centennial Medal for their work.

Eric and Elexis' actions embody the mitzvah of tikkun olam as they continue to find significant ways to make this a better world for so many.

The Kirshner File

Weimar on the Pacific

They were the best and the brightest, and they gave American cinema a new look, style and wit.

They were the film professionals who, having fled Nazi Germany and Austria, reinvented themselves in Hollywood.

From 1933 to 1940, more than 800 such individuals, the vast majority of whom were Jewish, immigrated to the United States, appalled by the spectre of persecution in Germany and Austria and buoyed by the shining promise of hope that America offered.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

In short, the Third Reich's loss was Hollywood's gain.

The émigrés were eminently successful, winning some 20 Academy Awards and 150 Oscar nominations. Such was their influence that Los Angeles, for a while at least, was known as Weimar on the Pacific.

Among the films they were associated with were Casablanca, Double Indemnity, Ninotchka, High Noon and Some Like It Hot, all of which are recognized as classics today.

Some of the new immigrants, however, never really landed on their feet. "This golden Hollywood is a hell," the composer Frederick Hollander bitterly complained.

Their story, which has unfortunately been obscured by the mists of time, was presented in the documentary Cinema's Exiles: From Hitler to Hollywood. It was screened by the Toronto Jewish Film Festival on April 21.

These craftsmen, whether they were screenwriters, directors, producers, actors or musicians, left an indelible impression on German film during its golden era after World War I.

Erich Pommer, one of its most influential figures, was head of production at the famed UFA studio from 1924 to 1926 and one of the forces behind the Expressionist movement, which had an enormous impact on Hollywood film noir.

Under Pommer's inspired direction, four seminal German films – The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari, Dr. Mabuse, Metropolis and The Blue Angel – were made.

Pommer, who worked with directors ranging from F.W. Murnau to Fritz Lang, was lured to Hollywood by Paramount Pictures and was the production manager of two Pola Negri films, Barbed Wire and Hotel Imperial.

Returning to UFA, he produced Josef von Sternebrg's The Blue Angel, starring a virtually unknown actress, Marlene Dietrich. Hounded out of Germany in 1939, Pommer signed on with RKO Pictures. But after suffering a heart attack, his contract was not renewed, and he and his wife had to support themselves by hand painting fine china in a porcelain factory. Clawing his way back, he capturing the 1955 Golden Globe Award for a German film he produced.

Billy Wilder, who established his reputation with a German film titled People on Sunday, was far more successful in the United States. Arriving in Hollywood in 1933, the year Adolf Hitler became chancellor, he hit his stride as a screenwriter in Ninotchka, which was directed by fellow émigré Ernst Lubitsch and starred Greta Garbo.

Hot on the heels of Ninotchka, for which he won his first Oscar nomination, Wilder wrote scripts for two box office hits, Hold Back the Dawn and Ball of Fire.

Making his directorial debut with The Major and the Minor, he subsequently helmed Double Indemnity, The Lost Weekend, Sunset Boulevard, Stalag 17 and Witness for the Prosecution. Later, Wilder directed The Seven Year Itch, Sabrina, Some Like It Hot and The Apartment.

Before his death in 2002, he won six Academy Awards and was nominated for 15 others.

Ernst Lubitsch, a tailor's son whose urbane and witty comedies included The Shop Around the Corner and To Be or Not to Be, left Germany in 1922 after working on Madame Du Barry and The Loves of Pharoah.

He directed Mary Pickford, a Canadian, in Rosita, and after signing a six-picture deal with Warner Brothers, he made, among other sophisticated comedies, So This Is Paris, The Love Parade, The Smiling Lieutenant, The Merry Widow and Design for Living.

Lubitsch's satirical comedy, Ninotchka, was probably his single most famous movie, but much to his regret, he never worked with Garbo again.

His anti-Nazi farce, To Be or Not to Be – which Mel Brooks crafted into a Broadway hit a few years ago – was Jack Benny's sole screen success and Carole Lombard's final film. Lubitsch's last production, That Lady in Ermine, was released posthumously in 1948, having been completed by Otto Preminger, who directed Exodus.

Fritz Lang, a Viennese Jew who converted to Christianity, directed M, a 1931 thriller whom critics consider his masterpiece. After settling in Los Angeles, following an interlude in Paris in which he worked with the French star Charles Boyer, he fell on hard times. Lang directed Spencer Tracy in the crime drama, Fury, but after demanding too many retakes, he was fired.

Finally adjusting to Hollywood, Lang directed a succession of films, notably Western Union, Ministry of Fear, Cloak and Dagger and Clash by Night. The Big Heat was probably his most notable film noir.

Fred Zinnemann, a former musician and student of law, was an extra in All Quiet on the Western Front, the anti-war classic. Directing westerns, thrillers and play adaptations, his movies were commercial and critical hits, running the gamut from High Noon and From Here to Eternity to Oklahoma! and A Man for All Seasons.

The anti-Nazi farce, To Be or Not to Be, was directed by Ernst Lubitsch.

Zinnemann gave Marlon Brando his first role in the 1950 film, The Men, and 19 of the actors who appeared in his subsequent movies received Academy Awards for their performances. They include Gary Cooper, Audrey Hepburn, Paul Scofield, Jason Robards, Vanessa Redgrave, Jane Fonda and Maximilian Schell.

Franz Waxman's chief claim to fame in Germany was orchestrating Frederick Hollander's score for The Blue Angel. Shortly after immigrating to the United States in 1935, he was commissioned to write the score for the horror film Bride of Frankenstein, which humanized that kitschy celluloid monster.

Prolific and highly successful, he won Oscars for Sunset Boulevard and A Place in the Sun and nominations for The Young at Heart, Rebecca, Suspicion, Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde, The Silver Chalice and The Nun's Story.

Always in demand, Waxman collaborated with, among others, Alfred Hitchcock.

Waxman's colleague, Erich Wolfgang Korngold, was a serious composer, having written orchestral and vocal works, operas and chamber works.

His film scores included The Adventures of Robin Hood – starring Errol Flynn – and King's Row and Of Human Bondage.

Of the actors who arrived in Hollywood from Germany, Peter Lorre and Hedy Lamarr were probably the most illustrious.

Lorre, whose original name was Laszlo Lowenstein, played a murderer in the German film M. In Hollywood, he specialized in portraying evil foreigners. He starred in the Mr. Motto series, appeared in The Maltese Falcon opposite Humphrey Bogart and had a part in Casablanca, which featured performances by German exiles such as Conrad Veidt and Paul Henreid.

Lamarr (Hedwig Eva Maria Kiesler), born Jewish and raised as a Catholic, starred in the notorious Czech film Ecstacy in 1933, but after meeting Hollywood studio mogul Louis B. Mayer, she was cast in Algiers, White Cargo, Tortilla Flat and Samson and Delilah, among other films.

Clearly, the émigrés had a profound effect on the American film industry, but some adapted better than others to their new homeland in the United States.

Israeli program sets up Cdn. advisory board

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

One of Israel's award-winning community volunteer organizations, which for the past 30 years has helped thousands of unaffiliated young Jewish North Americans connect with their Jewish roots, is forming a link to Canada.

Livnot U'Lehibanot (To Build and Be Built), with its headquarters in Safed in northern Israel, is a non-denominational and non-judgmental outreach program geared to imbuing unaffiliated young Jewish adults aged 21 to 30-plus with a sense of Jewish values, culture, history and religion.

Livnot has formed a Canadian advisory board in Israel that includes former Torontonians now living in Israel, including Rabbi Dow Marmur (Holy Blossom Temple), Rabbi Abraham Feder (Beth Tikvah Synagogue), and Rabbi Chaim Sacknovitz (Congregation Shaarei Shomayim).

Livnot, which emphasizes learning Judaism through nature and voluntary community support programs, has received recognition as an outstanding volunteer organization by the president of Israel, as well as Israeli mayors and government ministries.

Co-chaired by former Torontonians now living in Israel, Harvey Weinberg, Laurie Blendis and his wife, Maxine Blendis, the Canadian advisory board members have joined with others to spread the word about the multifaceted activities of Livnot for unaffiliated young Jewish adults and for needy people.

Recently, Aharon Botzer, founder and director of Livnot, and Weinberg, a former Torontonian now practising law in Israel, were in Toronto to meet with community leaders, rabbis, alumni and donors to establish the Canadian Friends of Livnot U'Lehibanot in Canada.

Botzer, a former teacher in Cleveland, made aliyah 40 years ago and says he fell in love with Safed. As a teacher and tour guide in Israel, he says that he realized that young people who came to Israel to "find themselves" either ended up in a kibbutz or went to a yeshiva.

"Many young people were looking for something in the middle. They wanted to learn something about Judaism and the culture," says Botzer. "Livnot was the alternative choice between the two extremes, and we began to emphasize hiking, nature, spirituality, community service and continuity."

It all began when Botzer and other families in Safed invited some North American young tourists to their homes.

Eventually, Livnot was formed. They purchased an abandoned house, which they restored and now serves as a campus for Livnot.

Its varied programs include a one-week "Northern Exposure" trip, two- or three-week "Galilee Fellowship" modules (either of which can be added to a 10-day Birthright Israel trip) or the extensive five-month MASA program that emphasizes learning from nature and helping the needy in Safed.

Its activities include, painting and restoring apartments for the elderly and needy, assisting Ethiopian children with school work, visiting the sick in hospital, painting and preparing bomb shelters.

"I saw that it was very meaningful for the young people to build and see the results of their efforts," Botzer says.

There is also a recreational aspect to the program. Participants in Livnot travel throughout Israel, including on a coast-to-coast trip as well as an overnight hike in the desert.

Weinberg told The CJN that he became involved with Livnot when his daughter, Shira, did her two-year national service with Livnot.

"When Shira brought home young people who had been on the verge of assimilation and intermarriage, they told us that they were searching for their roots and I realized the need for an organization like Livnot in Canada where, like the United States, assimilation and intermarriage among unaffiliated youth is close to 60 per cent."

Botzer says many young North American Jews don't know anything about Judaism other than the fact that they're Jewish. "Our objective is to imbue a sense of Jewish culture, history and their identity with their Jewish roots."

He adds that more than 5,000 young people from North America have participated in Livnot programs and many are now involved with their Jewish communities back home.

Botzer adds, "I give an open invitation to anyone who wants to visit us. They can contact me at Botzer@livnot.com."

Shul honours Czech Kindertransport organizer

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue will honour Sir Nicholas Winton with its Yakir Hakahal (Precious to the Community) award at a gala dinner May 6.

Winton, who rescued 669 refugee children during the Holocaust, is almost 101 years old – his birthday is May 19 – and lives in Maidenhead, England.

His son Nick, accompanied by his partner, journalist Monica Porter, whose mother was also a Holocaust rescuer, will travel here from England to accept the award on his behalf.

Journalist Joe Schlesinger – one of the children rescued by Winton – will also speak at the event. CJN editor Mordechai Ben-Dat will serve as MC.

Yakir Hakahal was established to recognize people who have made "a tremendous contribution" to the Jewish world and the world at large, according to a press release. Past recipients include Judge Sigmund Reiser, Toronto councillor Mike Feldman and Rabbi Joseph Kelman.

Funds raised at the dinner will support initiatives designed to teach children lessons of the Holocaust, and specifically a children's garden being planned at the 1,300-family synagogue. The garden will be dedicated in memory of children who perished in the Holocaust.

In a phone interview from his home in London, England, Nick Winton, now 57, told The CJN it wasn't until 1988 that he learned of his father's wartime bravery.

"It was only when [my parents] were trying to clear out the attic, and Mother wanted to know what to do with the trunks," he said. The trunks contained documentation about the Czech Kindertransport – eight trains in all – organized by Winton in 1939 to take refugee children to foster families in Britain.

A ninth train with 250 additional children was scheduled to leave Prague on Sept. 1, 1939, but the borders closed when Hitler invaded Poland that day. The children did not survive the war.

Winton was reunited with some of the children he saved on a BBC television show called That's Life. He was also the subject of a 2002 Emmy award-winning documentary, narrated by Schlesinger, called Nicholas Winton – The Power of Good. It aired on CBC in 2003 under the title Nicky's Children.

Sir Nicholas Winton at his 100th birthday party.

Nicholas Winton was born to German Jewish parents who immigrated to England at the turn of the last century. According to a number of websites, Winton was baptized Anglican, but "he's not a religious person," his son said. "If anything, he would call himself a humanist.

"I guess like a lot of people his age, he went through the war and didn't really talk about it. He moved on."

However, Nick noted, his father has always been "very public spirited," and has been involved in setting up a number of charities.

Nicholas Winton has been honoured by the Czech government, and was knighted by Queen Elizabeth in 2002. Earlier this year he received an award from British Prime Minister Gordon Brown commemorating more than 20 British heroes of the Holocaust.

He wanted to travel to Toronto, but was unable to do so, his son said.

Although he was hospitalized recently for "a small illness," his son said Winton is "still quite active today. He still has a remarkably good quality of life. He still plays bridge – not too badly."

He added that his father is still interested in world events, still attends concerts and, for his 100th birthday, went for a ride in a microlight airplane.

It was Nicholas Winton's interest in world affairs that prompted him to do what he did, his son believes. "He's always gotten involved in current affairs and politics. That made him aware of the danger, and he felt that nobody was taking the threat seriously."

Pre-1950 Jewish Toronto manuscript published

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

A 60-year-old manuscript titled The Rise of the Toronto Jewish Community has been found in the archives of Beth Tzedec Congregation.

Ralph Berrin, a volunteer in the Beth Tzedec Museum, brought the manuscript to the attention of Bill Gladstone, the publisher of Now and Then Books.

Gladstone identified the author as the late Shmuel Mayer Shapiro, the editor and publisher of the Hebrew Journal, Toronto's main Yiddish newspaper for half a century.

Shapiro stopped working on the manuscript about 1950. He died in 1958 and never saw it published.

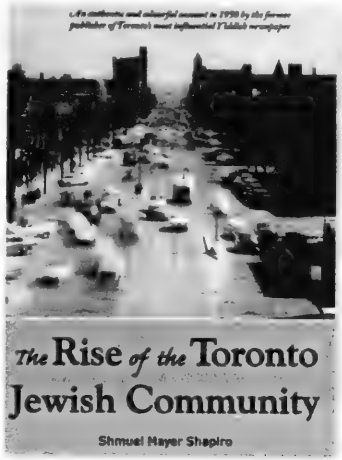
Gladstone received permission from the author's daughter to publish the manuscript under the author's original title.

"When the manuscript was brought to my attention, I was excited and intrigued, recognizing it as an important historical document highlighting the strong immigrant and Yiddish quality of the early Jewish community," Gladstone says.

He told The CJN that he is "very proud" to be the editor and publisher of the book.

"I consider it a valuable addition to the limited material available about the early years to about 1950 of the Toronto Jewish community."

The Rise of the Toronto Jewish Community includes 90 old photographs and illustrations, some of which are quite rare.



The book offers a detailed account of the evolution of the local Yiddish press, Jewish labour unions, the garment industry on Spadina Avenue, synagogues and rabbis, the beginning of Jewish communal and social life in Toronto and landsmanshaft.

The book includes an afterword by Ben Kayfetz titled Recollections and Experiences of the Jewish Press in Toronto, written in 1984; a glossary of Yiddish and Hebrew terms and a sample page from Shapiro's manuscript.

Shapiro was born in Mozir, Russia, in 1887. He came to New York as a youth and began to study to become a rabbi. Feeling increasingly drawn to socialism, he left yeshiva and came to Toronto, where he organized a pioneering branch of the cloakmakers' union.

As a sideline, he began writing at $2 a week and became the editor of the Yiddish Zhurnal, or Hebrew Journal, a profitable daily Yiddish newspaper. He took over as publisher and remained at its helm until 1957.

A gifted orator, Shapiro was also a provincial justice of the peace and an honorary president of the Canadian Jewish Congress.

"The traces of the early history of our community are disappearing. This now compels us to search them out and record them," Gladstone says.

The Rise of the Toronto Jewish Community is available from www.nowandthenbookstoronto.com and at Israel's the Judaica Stores at both locations, Eglinton Avenue West and Clark Avenue.

Stars help raise money through Scrabble

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Scrabble isn't just a game to Vivienne Muhling. It's the path to a mitzvah.

Muhling, a former actor and producer, started Scrabble With The Stars six years ago to raise money for Performing Arts Lodges (PAL).

Vivienne Muhling, a resident of the Performing Arts Lodges, has been organizing Scrabble With The Stars for six years.

The organization provides affordable housing and support to aging Canadian artists and has apartment buildings in Toronto and Vancouver.

As a resident of the PAL apartment complex in Toronto, which was built in 1993, Muhling understands its importance.

"This is a place that is created... for all members of the performing arts, whether in film or backstage... some of us need help financially" she said.

As chair of PAL's Scrabble With The Stars fundraising committee, Muhling sees the facility as more than just affordable housing.

"People live on their own [in the complex] but help each other. It's not just a building," she said, adding that volunteers are there to help with health and lifestyle issues.

"They can do just so much. When people become really sick... they have to leave us and they hate it," she said.

Muhling's current goal is to raise enough money to expand PAL in Toronto. The expansion would include nursing services, so that residents can get the care they need without moving to another facility.

And Scrabble is going to get her there.

Jeanne Beker, host of CTV's Fashion Television, co-hosted Scrabble With The Stars.

"It's not just a dinner," she said of the charity event. "It's a [night when] people play Scrabble together. It's a way of being more of a community. More friendly."

It's also a way of luring in celebrities.

"The stars love it. They enjoy it, that's why it's so successful," she said.

Some of the stars at this year's event included Mark Breslin, the founder of Yuk Yuk's, Canadian actor Avery Saltzman and Jeanne Beker, who hosted the event with actor Barry Flatman.

Beker, host of CTV's Fashion Television, has been attending Scrabble With The Stars for five years.

"I play Scrabble at my farm-house... it's intellectual but it's very social," she said, adding that the cause is worth supporting. "PAL is such a great place. It makes you feel like you're taking care of each other. Like you belong to a real family in a way."

For Breslin, Scrabble With The Stars, which raised about $50,000 this year, is a refreshing twist on charity events.

"It's a really lovely evening. I look forward to it. There's so many charity events that are so hard to sit through," he said. "Scrabble's a really nice game. It's the baseball of board games."

Scrabble expert Robin Pollock Daniel, centre, was auctioned off to players at the sixth annual Scrabble With The Stars.

For Robin Pollock Daniel, who has played in professional Scrabble tournaments, it's more than just a game.

"It's delicious. It's savoury. It [brings back] memories of childhood. It's home. It's family. It's mom. It's bowls of popcorn. Everyone has memories of sitting around playing games with their family," said Pollock Daniel, who was auctioned off at the event to help players. "[Scrabble] is something that everyone knows. It's a common meeting point."

Four-day reunion planned for Mackenzie's 50th

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

David Eisner and Avery Saltzman, co-artistic directors of the Harold Green Jewish Theatre Company, are among an estimated possible 3,000 alumni of William Lyon Mackenzie Collegiate Institute who plan to be at the school's 50th anniversary reunion on Sat., May 1.

The four-day event, being held at the Tillplain Road school, will kick off on Thurs., Apr. 29 at 7:30 p.m. with special guest Jeanne Beker of CTV's Fashion Television, also a Mackenzie graduate. Karen Mock – Thornhill's federal Liberal candidate, who co-wrote the school song – will MC the evening, which will include an alumni music performance and the launch of the school's solar panel project.

Eisner and Saltzman will speak the next night at 8 p.m. in the school library, following an introduction by Nathan Shuster, their drama teacher in the mid-1970s.

The Saturday night main event runs from 7 p.m. until midnight, and individual alumni get-togethers will be held on Sun., May 2.

Tickets for Saturday night are $20, either online by April 28, or at the door, cash only. The events on Thursday and Friday are free, and the Sunday get-togethers are $10 per person.

Some 1,600 former staff and students have registered on the reunion website (mackenziereunion.com), and organizers are anticipating there will be many more at the event itself. A reunion 10 years ago drew 3,000 people.

The school, which served students in Bathurst Manor, had a Jewish student population of about 90 per cent at one time. It was originally planned as a junior high, but a rapidly increasing population of baby boomers at Northview Heights Secondary School meant that another high school was needed in the area.

Larry Anklewicz

Mackenzie opened as Southview Secondary School in 1960, and a contest was held to rename it.

Reunion co-chair Larry Anklewicz – a lawyer who is also program co-ordinator for the Toronto Jewish Film Festival – said Mackenzie "was intended to be a very academic school, and anyone who didn't come up to the mark was encouraged to leave."

Anklewicz, who attended the school from 1960 to 1963, said he has very fond memories of the people, and of "a few teachers who were fabulous."

Although the last reunion, in 2000, allowed alumni to register online, the current website is more more sophisticated and interactive, Anklewicz said. Among other features, it allows participants to communicate without giving out their personal e-mail addresses.

"We've had e-mails from people in Vancouver, Winnipeg, various places in the United States, even from Israel," Anklewicz said.

He has heard that "quite a few" teachers, including some from the earliest days, will attend the reunion. A staff dinner will precede the Saturday night reunion.

Helene Green, now in her sixth year as Mackenzie principal, told The CJN it's been a pleasure working with alumni on the upcoming reunion. "They're a very engaging and spirited group."

Among them, she has reconnected with Anklewicz' co-chair, Linda Miller, a 1974 graduate who at the start of her career taught at Mackenzie for three months, replacing a science teacher who was on sick leave. Miller and Green worked together at Georges Vanier Secondary School, where both were vice-principals.

Miller, who took early retirement from the Toronto District School Board, said that Mackenzie has been "such a foundation in this community. Over the 50 years, it's really maintained its reputation for excellence."

Also, she remembers, students were encouraged to "follow their own paths.

"We had a lot of very creative teachers," she recalls. Miller mentioned attending "Alternative Days," a two-day event organized by students for students, with speakers such as lawyer Clayton Ruby, political leaders from three parties, and magician Doug Henning.

"It was a pretty new thing then," she said.

Saltzman traces the beginning of his acting career back to his high school days, when he and Eisner starred in a Mackenzie production of Fiddler on the Roof.

"It was such a seminal moment," Saltzman recalled. "I remember saying to myself in the middle of that play, 'This is what I'm going to do the rest of my life.' It turned out kind of great."

Eisner said he also fell in love with acting at Mackenzie. "It was a really good time," he added.

Saltzman said he has fond memories of the sense of community he felt growing up in Bathurst Manor and attending the school.

Notable Mackenzie alumni who are recognized on the school website (www.wlmac.ca/50for50), include Mel Cappe, president of the Institute for Research on Public Policy and former High Commissioner for Canada to the United Kingdom; Toronto Star columnist Rosie DiManno, and social worker and television personality Joe Rich.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Jewish Life

It's all commentary

By RABBI TZVI HERSH WEINREB

I have often responded to the question of why Jews have written so much commentary on a few basic biblical texts, by resorting to an old story of one of our greatest sages, Hillel.

In this story, Hillel, known for his scholarship and commitment to Torah study but particularly famous for his patience, is challenged by a heathen who demands to be taught the entire Torah while standing on one foot. Hillel accepts the challenge and says, "What is hateful to you do not do unto others. That is the entire Torah, the rest is but commentary. Now go out and study the commentary."

Guest Voice

Rabbi Tzvi Hersh Weinreb

I would explain that Hillel's remark was based on a verse in this week's double Torah portion, Acharei Mot Kedoshim. There, in Leviticus 19:18, we read, "And thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself."

Now, I would continue, loving one's neighbour as oneself is no easy task. We are likely to have numerous and diverse neighbours in our lifetime, and myriad circumstances arise that pose great barriers to our love for them. And so, Jewish scholars throughout the ages have recorded their advice and guidelines for how to love one's neighbour in every context.

Note that Hillel himself does not choose to use the Torah's original phrase to explain the essence of Judaism. He does not say, "Love your neighbour." Rather, he says, "Do not harm your neighbour." Perhaps this is because, as the medieval commentator Ramban suggests, loving one's neighbour as oneself is an exaggerated expectation, and the most Hillel could do was to urge the heathen to do no harm.

Whether one uses the biblical formulation commanding us to love our neighbour, or chooses Hillel's version asking us to refrain from harming him or her in a way that we ourselves would not want to be harmed, the essence of our Torah is this ethical imperative. And the many hundreds of volumes written throughout the centuries can all be understood as the constant struggle of our sages to develop a "database" sufficient to enable us to realize this ethical imperative.

One such commentary deserves mention, particularly in our age and culture. It's a story about a disciple of Rabbi Mendel of Kotzk who eavesdropped on his master as the latter was reviewing this week's Torah portion aloud. Rabbi Mendel read, "And thou shalt love thy neighbour – as yourself? Yes, as yourself!" First as a question, then as a forceful declaration.

The disciple was puzzled by the way his master read the passage. He asked the master's chief disciple, Reb Hershel, for an explanation. This was his answer:

"The master first asked a question. Can it be that we are asked to love our neighbour as ourselves? Are we to understand that it is permissible to love oneself? Is it not a basic teaching here in Kotzk that one dare not love oneself, lest he thereby become blind to his own faults? Rabbi Mendel could not accept the slightest suggestion that narcissism was acceptable.

"Then the master realized a deeper meaning of the verse. We ought to love our neighbour to the same extent that we are critical of ourselves. The mitzvah is that we put in as much effort loving our neighbour as… we should be investing in our own personal spiritual and moral perfection."

In our age of "me first," it is even more important that we direct our love outward toward the other, and not inward toward ourselves. We must, at all costs, avoid self-adulation and self-worship.

That is just one small sample of the vast treasure of commentary that is in our Jewish library. No wonder our sages refer to the "ocean of the Talmud," and to our Torah as deeper than the sea.

Rabbi Tzvi Hersh Weinreb is the executive vice-president emeritus of the Orthodox Union.

Paying for health care

The issue of heath care, and specifically the economics of health care, has taken a central role recently, both here and south of the border. Like it or hate it, the new health care bill in the United States is undoubtedly one of the most important pieces of legislation in years, one that will permanently change the face of America. And earlier this month, in a move that caught many by surprise, the Ontario government announced that generic drug companies will no longer be allowed to pay pharmacies to carry their products. That announcement alone shaved close to 10 per cent off the price of Shoppers Drug Mart stock.

Money Matters

By Rabbi Jay Kelman CA

Paying for essential services has sparked debate from time immemorial. Should the community at large bear the burden of such expenses, with the wealthy being taxed at much higher rates, or should the primary model be one based on some form of user fee? This debate plays out in such issues as the funding of education (where society at large sees this as an essential service that all must contribute to, whereas the Jewish community operates with a user fee approach), salaries for religious functionaries and synagogue building funds.

While the payment for the above services are discussed rather extensively in our classic sources, to the best of my knowledge, the same cannot be said regarding the funding of health care. Living under foreign domination, the broad issues of health care were apparently less pertinent to the Jewish community.

The "private" nature of health care during talmudic times can be seen in the following ruling. Included in the obligation to support a wife was the obligation to pay for her medical bills. Yet the husband is within his legal (if not moral) rights to divorce his wife, pay her the value of her ketuba (an ancient form of alimony) and free himself from the need to continue paying her medical fees. Presumably health care was just one of many needs that the individual was expected to pay for – and those who lacked funds would turn to charitable sources.

As an essential service, Jewish law does regulate the cost of health care. In theory, doctors are not allowed to receive payment for treating patients. One is not allowed to receive payment for performing any mitzvah and preserving health is a (and perhaps the) primary mitzvah of Judaism. Of course, our sages realized that such a system couldn't work in practice and allowed a doctor to receive payment for his efforts and the opportunity cost of forgoing other forms of gainful employment. Furthermore, no recourse was available against a doctor who did in fact charge, or even overcharge, for his or her diagnosis, as "he sold his wisdom, which is priceless."

The same is not true regarding pharmaceuticals. In order to ensure availability for all, prices must be kept at an affordable rate even if that means limiting the profits of drug companies. Whether that would include the disallowing of payment to pharmacies for carrying products is much less clear. One would need to examine not only the price impact but also the effect on drug availability and even corporate profits before reaching any conclusions.

Our sages well understood the power of, and the need for, a profit motive as an inducement to meet market demand. This is especially true regarding pharmaceuticals, where the investment needed to find new drugs can be quite substantial and such investment would only be carried out if there were potential for solid profits. Thus Jewish law recognizes both some sort of patent protection for drug companies and the right of generic companies to compete at the proper time. Finding the proper balance between these competing needs requires constant vigilance, monitoring and tweaking.

Jewish Life

A new biography of Yehuda Halevi

By MARTIN LOCKSHIN

The so-called Golden Age in Spain was a short period when Jews and Christians living in Andalusia (Muslim-controlled Spain) experienced some amount of freedom. Before that era came to a disastrous end in 1148 – when the radical Muslim Almohades invaded and reversed the policies of the local liberal Muslims – Christians, Jews and Muslims in Spain thrived culturally, producing some of the best-known medieval works of poetry, philosophy, language, science and religion.

Martin Lockshin

Some Jewish writers from this period (which historians today prefer to call the "convivencia," the period of "coexistence" of different religious groups) left an indelible mark on later Jewish thinking, among them the famous poet and philosopher, Yehuda Halevi (1075-1141). Schocken Books has just published a gripping new biography of Halevi by the accomplished author and translator, Hillel Halkin, who was born in the United States and moved to Israel 40 years ago.

Halevi is best known – both by supporters and detractors – for his major work of Jewish thought, The Kuzari. Written in Judeo-Arabic, the language preferred by most Jewish writers of the convivencia in Muslim Spain, the book is set 400 years before Halevi's time. As the book's fuller title (The Book of Refutation and Proof on Behalf of the Despised Religion) implies, it provides a stirring apologia for the Jewish religion. It takes the form of fictional dialogues between the king of Khazaria (near the Black Sea) and a nameless rabbi who explains the basics of Judaism to the king. At the end of the dialogue, the rabbi explains to the king that he must leave because he is moving to the land of Israel, the true home of the Jewish people and religion.

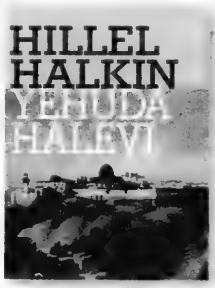
The central argument of The Kuzari is still taught today and seen as compelling by many Jewish religious educators. It is particularly popular among kiruv organizations, groups that reach out to the not-yet-religious, in an attempt to lead them to observance.

The rabbi in the story contends that the Jewish religion is based on compelling evidence: an unbroken and unchallenged tradition passed on from one Jewish generation to the next, that God miraculously took the Israelites out of Egyptian bondage and gave them laws to live by. Halevi further implies that this consensus about ancient Jewish history was also shared by the Christians and Muslims of his time. From his perspective, all civilized people of his world believed that God had indeed performed miracles for the Israelites. Naturally they should then feel bound to obey God's laws.

The second part of The Kuzari's basic theology is not taught as often as the first, at least not in North America. The rabbi explains that the Torah was given specifically to Jews because, even before they received the Torah, they were "the pick of humanity," with a propensity for prophecy that non-Jews did not have. He adds that although converts are welcome to Judaism, they will never reach the lofty status that born Jews have. And just as Jewish people are different from other people, so the Land of Israel is essentially different from other lands. It is, under the right conditions, the land best suited for prophecy. Amazingly, in Halevi's story, the Khazar king converts even after hearing this.

The Kuzari's claims resonate very little with Halkin, who devotes only a small portion of his book to The Kuzari, despite its popularity throughout the ages. Instead, Halkin focuses on Halevi's secular poetry, especially his love poetry (with shorter treatments of his religious and Zionist poetry). In that secular poetry, Halkin, a non-observant Jew with strong literary skills, finds his essential Halevi.

Halkin explains in detail how Halevi's poetry beautifully exemplifies the convivencia, specifically the influence of Arabic/Muslim literary styles on Jewish poets. Between biblical times and the 20th century, no secular Hebrew poetry was ever produced that came close to the quality of that of Halevi and his colleagues in Andalusia, and they clearly reached those heights by learning from local Muslims.



Halkin provides his own beautiful translations and incisive analysis for many of Halevi's poems. He notes that most of the love poems were probably written simply as literary exercises, "more to demonstrate facility with the genre" than to reflect true life experiences of the poet.

But Halkin is so moved by Halevi's Why, My Darling, Have You Barred All News? that he is convinced that it must reflect the feelings of a broken-hearted Halevi who, in his 20s, while he was still single, "had a love affair" with a woman who subsequently left him. Halkin claims that a poem of this quality and passion, "the greatest examplar" of Hebrew love poetry "in all of post-biblical Hebrew literature," could not have been "a purely literary creation." (This one poem is the sum total of evidence for Halevi's "affair.")

Toward the conclusion of the book, we discover another reason why Halkin is so taken by Halevi's story. Like the fictional rabbi in The Kuzari, Halevi, at the end of his life, decided to move to the Land of Israel. We know that he got as far as Egypt and lingered there for a few months. A few months after that, he was dead. He presumably reached Israel, but there is no record of him there. Jewish legend, first recorded centuries after his death, claims that just as Halevi reached the gates of Jerusalem, he was trampled to death by a Muslim horseman. As Halkin notes, even if this romantic story has a kernel of truth to it, the perpetrator in Crusader-controlled Jerusalem of 1141 would more likely have been a Christian.

Halkin, a product of the convivencia of America, writes admiringly about his role model, Halevi, the product of the convivencia of Spain who chose (as Halkin did 800 years later) to leave a land of multicultural coexistence and move to the land of the Jews. Halkin opposes those readers who claim that Halevi must have "repented" and turned his back on the convivencia when he decided to leave Spain and set sail for Israel. Some scholars have even argued that Halevi never really subscribed to the idea of cultural coexistence, as his comments in The Kuzari on the chosenness of the Jews might imply. The bête noire Israeli philosopher, Yeshayahu Leibowitz, even blamed Halevi for causing modern Jewish "nationalist and racist chauvinism," particularly in the religious settler movement that considers Halevi one of their heroes.

Halkin, however, insists that aliyah is not an abandonment of the values of convivencia, neither for him nor for Halevi. He passionately defends Halevi against the charges of his modern critics and claims that Halevi, like Halkin, always appreciated and never abandoned the world of coexistence with gentiles, even though he left them and moved to Israel. In Halkin's case at least, there is no doubt that he brought his western values with him to Israel.

Readers who appreciate Zionism without rejecting western values, who love poetry or who just like reading a beautifully written if idiosyncratic biography of a famous Jew will find much pleasure in Hillel Halkin's Yehuda Halevi.

Seymour Schulich donates $2 million for groundbreaking Israeli school technology

Project funded through UJA Federation of Greater Toronto

By Howard English

Teachers and students in more than 400 Israeli classrooms will soon be thinking smart thanks to a visionary $2 million donation from Toronto philanthropist Seymour Schulich toward a futuristic education program in Israel. The exciting project is being funded through UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

The smart classroom initiative is a joint venture of World ORT, the Israeli government and local municipalities.

UJA Federation is partnering with World ORT, the leading Jewish non-governmental organization that specializes in cutting edge education and vocational training, on the Schulich Canada Smart Classroom Initiative. Through the initiative, approximately 40,000 students will be provided with laptop computers in the classroom, connected wirelessly to the teacher's workstation and an electronic whiteboard at the front of the class. This new, pioneering classroom technology will allow teachers in 411 Israeli classrooms to integrate sound, animation, video, live web content and text in an interactive fashion. Images displayed on the whiteboard can be directed to student laptops and, students will be able to work on their laptops throughout the lesson.

The wireless network links student computers, the teacher's work station and the whiteboard. Eventually, the "smart classroom" technology will also be connected to ORT's video conferencing network covering countries such as Russia and other former Soviet states, Italy, Argentina, Australia, Uruguay, Mexico and many others.

"This initiative offers boundless opportunities for educational excellence on a scale that may have been contemplated but never implemented before," said Schulich. "All of the northern Israel classrooms benefiting from this endeavour are located in economically or socially distressed areas and 20 percent serve Israeli-Arab children."

Among the many schools implementing the Smart Classroom Initiative are:

• Megiddo Regional Junior and Senior School which educates many children who have special needs, including blind youngsters and those suffering from Down's syndrome and cerebral palsy.

• The Anne Frank High School at Kibbutz Sasa, which educates Jewish, Arab, Druze and Circassion students.

• Birav Elementary school, serving Orthodox Jewish students in Safed.

Seymour Schulich

• The Abu Salim Salman Alshich Comprehensive School in the historic Israeli village of Abu Sna'an. The school, with 1,200 students, runs classes for disabled children including those with hearing impairments.

The Schulich Canada Smart Classroom Initiative will follow the World ORT Smart Classroom pilot project, launched in April 2008. At that time, Israel's former Education Minister Yuli Tamir called it "a revolution" and "the first step in the process that will bring Israeli schools into the 21st century."

Israeli Vice Prime Minister Sylvan Shalom, the current Minister for Development of the Galilee and the Negev, said the new technology would improve the learning capabilities for children in northern Israel. This technology will "inevitably lead to a reduction in the social gaps that now exist between the northern and central regions of the country," Shalom said.

"I am extremely grateful to Seymour Schulich for this outstanding donation," said Robert Singer, director general & CEO of World ORT. "It means a great deal that the leading donation for this initiative has come from a person of his calibre."

"The more than 400 classrooms that will be part of this exciting initiative now join a remarkable family of schools across Canada connected with the Schulich brand in educational excellence," noted UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, president & CEO Ted Sokolsky. "We were thrilled to help facilitate this gift that will have an educational impact for many decades to come."

Seymour Schulich is one of the country's most respected business leaders and philanthropists, whose commitment to education has transformed education facilities across Canada and around the world. He has made gifts to York University - including the internationally respected Schulich School of Business - the University of Western Ontario, University of Calgary, Dalhousie University, McGill University, and Nipissing University. He has also donated to the University of Nevada, Reno, and the Technion (Israel Institute of Technology).

World ORT is the world's largest Jewish education and vocational training non-government organization and whose services have reached more than 3 million people - Jewish and non-Jewish - in 100 countries since its founding in 1880.

New Jewish Family & Child offices open their doors

UJA Federation creates new home for agency's vital work

By Daniel Horowitz

On Monday, April 12 the new and improved offices of Jewish Family & Child (JF&CS) opened their doors for the first time, making life for Toronto's Jewish families in need more convenient and accessible than ever before.

Spread out over approximately 15,000 square feet on the first and second floors of the Lipa Green Centre for Jewish Community Services on Sherman Campus, the new state-of-the-art headquarters will greet clients of the agency in a warm and welcoming light-filled reception area.

"The new JF&CS offices are an uplifting environment that will honour the efforts of our staff and dignify our clients," said Richard Cummings, executive director, JF&CS. "This is a compelling message from our Jewish community reflecting the most honourable values to ensure the safety, security and healthy development of the community. Indeed, our new space in the Lipa Green Centre is a vibrant tribute to the leadership and vision of UJA Federation. I also want to thank UJA's real estate team comprised of David Sadowski, Andrea Gaichuk and Stephanie Olin Chapman for their outstanding support."

Made possible by a generous gift of $2 million to UJA Federation through the Lewar Estate, the new Stephan and Sophie Lewar Family Services Floor also includes a colourful play area for children; bright, well appointed group counseling rooms, and a residential-style supervised family access room and a café-style informal meeting area. The staff office areas are newly furnished with the latest in ergonomic work stations and chairs. A staff kitchen and lounge overlooking the wooded slope of the ravine has been designed to facilitate informal social and collegial interaction and provide a calm respite from the more serious and stressful work of the agency.

"As supervisor of the JF&CS Woman Abuse Program, I can say that our program's clients come through our doors tentatively and with apprehension," said Debra Feldman. "They are in a very vulnerable state. They often come without their partner's knowledge and worry that he will know, will find out and that she will pay the price for this. She also carries the additional burden of shame due to the secrecy attached to woman abuse in the Jewish community. Direct access to our premises means that we will now be more accessible to women. It is so important for these women to no longer have to be visible to so many, worrying about who has seen them. At our new offices, they can seek help with safety and security."

"I think the most significant benefit to our clients will be the supervised Family Room," said Talyah Breslin, supervisor of child protection, JF&CS. "This will allow our clients who have children in the care of JF&CS to visit together in a warm and child-friendly environment. The room will be equipped with a fridge and microwave so that parents can make meals for their children. The room will also have toys and other equipment that will facilitate positive interactions and allow for visits to be more relaxed."

Stephan Lewar grew up in Warsaw, graduating from university there with a Masters in Economics in 1939, just months before the German invasion. His thesis was on "The Expanding Japanese Economy". The War changed his life forever. His parents were killed in the Holocaust and only he and his brother survived. After the war, he fled to Paris with his wife Sophie, to wait for Canadian visas.

"Arriving in Canada with nothing but his talent and education, Stephan built an exceptionally successful international electronics business, travelling all over the world, but especially to Japan, ironically, the country he had studied in university and where he first partnered with a young company known as Panasonic," explained Ted Sokolsky, president & CEO, UJA Federation. "Years later, when Stephan and Sophie's son Richard passed away unexpectedly in 1998, they established the Heart and Stroke Richard Lewar Centre of Excellence for Cardiovascular Research at the University of Toronto. Richard's passing in fact triggered a new found desire to repair the world and ultimately in their later years he and Sophie became avid philanthropists providing huge support to UJA, JIAS, the Hospital for Sick Children, Mazon Canada and of course JF&CS."

Israel...

By PAULA CITRON
Special to The CJN

The population of Israel is about the same as that of the Greater Toronto Area, Hamilton and London combined, yet the representation of its dance and theatre companies around the globe belies its small size.

Why? The answer is simple. The government invites presenters and producers (and in my case, arts journalists) to come to an annual curated event called International Exposure (IE) to experience Israeli dance and theatre. The Israelis pick up the tab for hotel and land transportation, with a day trip to Jerusalem thrown in for good measure.

IE 2009 took place Dec. 5 to 13. The dance showcase attracted 125 people from 34 countries, while theatre, which also included Israeli world music, was attended by 34 people from 17 countries. Since we were there on the Israeli government's dime, so to speak, we were heavily programmed. In all, I sat through well over 50 productions, with upward of seven events a day.

Most of the dance IE took place at the Suzanne Dellal Centre for Dance and Theatre. Founded in 1989, the complex includes four buildings carved into theatres and studios on what used to be a private Jewish school campus. The centre is located in picturesque Neve Tzedek, first settled in the early 1900s by pioneers who moved out of the Arab town of Jaffa to found a Jewish city. From the seeds of Neve Tzedek, mighty Tel Aviv has grown, and the area's quaint, narrow streets are filled with antique shops, artists' ateliers and restaurants with atmosphere.

In terms of theatre venues, we were all over Tel Aviv. One of the most exotic spaces is the Hasimta (Alley) Theatre, located in the historic Jaffa casbah. Several small performance spaces have been created out of a warren of rooms, and there is a spectacular roof terrace decorated in period Arabic furnishings overlooking Jaffa City. A diametric opposite is the splashy, modernist Tel Aviv Performing Arts Complex, which houses the Cameri Theatre's five venues and the Israeli Opera. And then there is the home of the fringe, the Tmu-na Theatre, which is spread out over a series of what used to be auto repair shops in an industrial part of Tel Aviv.

(And a side note: the day we were at the Cameri, one of its theatres was showing a production of Fiddler on the Roof to an audience of soldiers. These special performances for the military are underwritten by a father to honour his son who was killed on duty. In the courtyard, fellow soldiers were guarding their colleagues' kit bags. We were allowed to peek into the theatre and saw a joyous sight – all these young men and women in combat fatigues singing and clapping along to the music.)

...promoting dance and theatre

The emphasis of IE dance is contemporary. The three major Israeli companies, in terms of size and international reputation, were all at IE – Batsheva, Kibbutz and Kamea. The rest were smaller companies that were either already on the international circuit or companies Israeli dance curators were hoping would be picked up. It should be noted that Israel has an extraordinary number of strong male dancers, and that both the men and women are well trained.

In theatre, the story is the opposite. The biggest companies – Habimah National Theatre being the most notable – are not exciting foreign interest because, to be perfectly frank, they are pedestrian. The government apparatchik who curated the theatre IE was a candid woman, and she bemoaned the conservative nature of Habimah and its like. A typical example of dullness are the two plays we saw by Savion Librecht. She is, apparently, a highly acclaimed poet, but she is a mediocre playwright.

Librecht's themes are extremely interesting, but she treats plots with plodding conventionality. The Banality of Love is about the relationship between Jewish-German political theorist Hanna Arendt and German philosopher Martin Heidegger. The two were lovers in pre-Nazi Germany, and Arendt came to the support of Heidegger, a Nazi apologist, after the war, much to the disgust of the Jewish community worldwide. Apples from the Desert tells the story of a girl from a haredi Jerusalem family who runs off with a free-spirited kibbutznik. What these plays, could have or should have been in more inspired hands, beggars the question. Not surprisingly, given the Luddite mindset of the Israeli theatre establishment, Librecht was awarded the 2004 Playwrights Award.

The bulk of the theatre showings were either physical theatre or object theatre because that is where innovation is taking place, and truly, there were breathtaking leaps of imagination in some of these performances.

Apparently, it's the graduates of the School of Visual Theatre based in Jerusalem who are the front line of Israeli theatre experimentation. As well, Russian immigrants have enriched Israeli theatre life with their own clown/physical theatre tradition.

Here are just two examples of supreme theatrical originality. Orto-Da Theatre's Stones is inspired by the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising Monument by sculptor Nathan Rapoport. Coated in Dead Sea mud, six actors recreate the monument's six sculpted figures, and then narrate the uprising through the eyes of the rebels. You believe you are looking at pure stone until they begin to move. Daniel Landau's One Dimensional Man is even harder to describe. Imagine large egg-shaped video screens. Then project onto these screens, real faces distorted through animation. Then have these oversized eggs become faces for live actors. Then have figures covered head to toe in black, like kuroko stagehands (stagehands in traditional Japanese theatre dress all in black) from kabuki theatre, manoeuvre these eggshell faces around the stage as the live actors move behind them to a pre-recorded story.

We did see a highly touted production of Hamlet at the Cameri Theatre, which placed the audience, each of us on a swivel chair, in two facing groups. The action took place down the middle and all around the exterior. Actor Itai Tiran has become a heart-throb of the teenage set with his modern-day, rebellious, spoiled-brat Hamlet. Other than that, it wasn't a particularly innovative show for those of us used to Canada's Stratford Festival.

Israeli dance tends to be similar to contemporary dance around the world – a typical mix of narrative dance theatre, abstractions on a theme, gender issues and personal essays. I have a short fuse when it comes to Eurotrash, which I define as self-indulgent, pretentious twaddle that usually involves an elaborate use of props and sets, postmodern movement pedestrianisms, and an incomprehensible through line (the underlying motivational or structural unity of a scene, play or character). Well, Israel has Eurotrash, which, needless to say, is popular with European presenters. For example, Trout, by the Inbal Pinto and Avshalom Pollak Dance Company, involved all manner of silly vignettes performed in water with a lonely figure who resembles Queen Elizabeth I wandering through the flood.

One of my favourite shows was Michal Herman's droll dance theatre Fellowship. Based on a Kafka absurdist short story, the plot involves a group of five who don't want to be a group of six. The bulk of the dance is taken up with how the five try to shut out the sixth. Each of the characters has his or her own delightful personality and choreographic motif, supported by a solo musical instrument.

I also loved the satiric 4 Men, Alice, Bach and the Deer, co-choreographed by Yossi Berg and Oded Graf, who use a brilliant combination of burly movement, text, song and male-specific props such as Mexican wrestling masks, rifles, and a large deer to portray a humour noir skewering of machismo – and all to Bach. Alice is their ideal woman.

I have to say that I was surprised by the lack of political works both in dance and theatre. There are two notable exceptions.

The cast of Arkadi Zaides' heartfelt dance piece Quiet includes two Israelis (Zaides and Ofir Yudilevitch) and two Arabs (Muhammad Mugrabi and Rabia Khuri). It is a piece that is about aggression and compassion, set against the backdrop of cut-out doves of peace. The beginning is unforgettable as each man outlines the body of the other, but can't quite bring himself to enact physical touching. The progression finds the dancers both moving closer, yet drawing farther apart. It is a troubling, yet hopeful, meditation on war and peace.

The play Janana (Flipout) by Yiftach Klein features Arab actor Shadi Srour and Israeli actor Einat Weizmann who respectively play all the male and female roles. Based on Klein's own army experiences during the first intifadah, the flashpoint is the accidental killing of an Arab child at an Israeli checkpoint and the domino effect of that death on people's lives.

An extraordinary thing happened at the Q&A that followed. I told Klein that his play had a zero chance of being picked up for North American audiences because the prevailing sentiment on this side of the Atlantic is that Israel can never be shown in a bad light. At this point, our government apparatchik launched into a tirade, telling us Israel wanted the world to see that the country can tolerate self-criticism, and the bane of her existence is the tunnel vision of North American Jews.

I left IE with a deep sense of envy. Without doubt, Israel has a culture where the arts are given pride of place. Our own country could learn a thing or two.

Undergraduate fraternity reborn

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

After an absence of almost half a century, the undergraduate chapter of the pharmaceutical fraternity Rho Pi Phi has been re-established at the University of Toronto.

Rho Pi Phi International Pharmaceutical Fraternity is made up of professionals in the pharmaceutical field. Toronto's chapter, called Rokeah, was established in 1926, and an undergraduate chapter, known as Nu chapter, was established a few decades later, but it eventually petered out. Until last fall.

In 2009, Joshua Lieblein, a fourth-year undergraduate pharmacy student at U of T was approached by some of Rho Pi Phi's professional members about possibly re-starting the chapter on campus.

"I'd been aware of Rho Pi Phi through my parents and grandparents, and through other friends I had in the community who would talk about the influence of Rho Pi Phi in decades gone by," Lieblein said. "I didn't think I'd ever have the chance to bring it back."

After meeting with pharmacists who are members of Rho Pi Phi's Toronto chapter, Lieblein started recruiting students from September to December 2009.

While the organization itself is non-sectarian, meaning any gender or ethnicity can join, most of the Toronto members are Jewish, as are the seven new undergraduate members.

"Older members asked me if I was interested. I took the initiative," Lieblein said.

On April 11, the new members were officially inducted into the fraternity.

Lieblein sees the fraternity as an opportunity for students to form bonds early in their careers.

"I thought it would be appropriate, given that there were not very many Jewish students [in the program], to have a nucleus of students that stick together and help each other out," he said.

"Pharmacy has become a very challenging program. It's nice for people to have your back. The relationships you form are very important. Business and social relationships were very instrumental in helping [the older members] achieve success."

Like Rokeah, the new undergraduate chapter will have a social role and will help members build contacts.

"It's a lot of work, pharmacy. We have seven courses a term. We want to offer some social events, some [that may be] Jewishly based," Lieblein said. "It will give students a chance to relax and have some happy memories."

Fred Stoll, the chancellor of Rokeah, hopes to see the undergraduate chapter grow and expand to different campuses.

"We hope eventually that it will grow... [and] help Rho Pi Phi to continue as a fraternity. As we grow older, more people are passing away," he said.

Right now, Rho Pi Phi members are exploring the possibility of starting an undergraduate chapter at the University of Waterloo's school of pharmacy.

Stoll said older members of the fraternity can help newer members.

"[Fraternity members] have quite a strong bond. These people have been together for 40, 50 years. We would serve as their mentors," he said.

Reina Bendayan, a professor in the Leslie Dan Faculty of Pharmacy at U of T and the undergraduate chapter's faculty adviser, was impressed with the diverse group of professionals that showed up to the induction ceremony.

York U report angers conference organizers

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Organizers of a York University-sponsored conference on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict were angered by the school's recently released review of the three-day event.

The conference, called "Israel/Palestine:Mapping Models of Statehood and Paths to Peace," held last June, was criticized by Jewish groups, who said it was one-sided and anti-Israel.

York's president, Mamdouh Shoukri, commissioned Frank Iacobucci, a former Supreme Court of Canada judge, to review the conference last August. The report was posted on York's website earlier this month ago and drew criticism from conference organizers, which included York professors, as impeding academic freedom.

Mamdouh Shoukri

After the report was released, organizers publicized a series of e-mails acquired through a freedom of information request.

The e-mails, sent to Shoukri and Patrick Monahan, the school's provost, by senior York officials such as Marshall Cohen, chair of York's board of governors, urged the president to relocate the conference off-campus and include new speakers.

"We were subject to a great deal of political pressure… and also pressure from the administration," Bruce Ryder, one of the organizers and a professor at Osgoode Hall Law School, told The CJN. "The pressure was aimed at interfering with the conference program and alternatively denying us the use of campus space."

In one e-mail to Shoukri, Cohen voiced his concerns about the conference, stating that it "is bad news in and of itself, but on top of recent events [including a number of clashes between pro- and anti-Israel students] it will be a disaster."

Cohen, who could not be reached for comment, went on to recommend that the conference be moved off campus.

A number of Jewish groups held protests at York's Glendon Campus, where the event was held, while UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy issued a joint statement saying the conference would focus on a one-state solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, effectively advocating an end to Israel as a Jewish state.

In the weeks leading up to the conference, Gary Goodyear, minister of state for science and technology, urged the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council, a federal agency, to review its $19,750 grant to the event, because initial grant proposals didn't detail speakers. He cited concerns that some of the scheduled speakers had made anti-Israel and anti-Semitic comments in the past.

The Canadian Association of University Teachers called for his resignation for "unprecedented efforts to interfere" with the event.

Conference organizers have set up a website, www.fragilefreedomatyorku.ca, that outlines their experiences with the conference and includes the e-mails obtained through an FOI request. The site also has a critique of Iacobucci's report, which calls on York to undertake an internal review of university policies.

The report, which can be found on the office of the president's website, states that "it is wrong to assume that academic freedom is unlimited and without constraint" and that "the concept of academic freedom… entails not only rights but also responsibilities." The report adds that these responsibilities are not defined as clearly as they should be in York's policies.

Conference organizers said that the report doesn't focus on the role of York's administration in supporting academic freedom as much as it should.

York spokesperson Keith Marnoch said the fact the conference was held on campus shows that academic freedom wasn't impeded.

"It really is a view of the university that academic freedom was not breached in this case," Marnoch said. "Despite the contention around it, the university did support the conference."

Marnoch added that the organizers have a right to make the e-mails public.

"They're making their opinions known," he said.

Iacobucci's report will be reviewed by York's senate academic policy planning and research committee, which will help determine what changes to make to university policy, Marnoch said.

Daniel Ferman, citywide student chair of Hillel of Greater Toronto, commended the university for commissioning and releasing a review of the conference.

"I think that Hillel and all students would agree that academic freedom is an integral part of university life, but it should never be used as a substitute for a balanced discussion," he said. "It was an unbalanced conference dealing with Israel's right to exist, and that's a non-starter."

Ryder disagrees.

"I think many of those opinions [from Jewish groups] were ill-informed," he said. "We did our very best to attract a wide range of perspectives… We were willing to accept advice from any and all scholars about who to invite and how best to accomplish academic objectives."

Teens work to make the world a better place

Compiled by CJN Staff

Hundreds of Toronto-area teens will be among the 10,000 across North America, Europe and Israel who will work to improve the world during an international day of community service.

They will be taking part in J-Serve, the Global Day of Jewish Youth Service, on April 25.

This is the first year that Toronto teens will have the opportunity to participate in the international initiative, thanks to funding by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. J-Serve Toronto is a joint project of BBYO, Canadian Young Judaea, Congregation Darchei Noam, Habonim Dror, Hashomer Hatzair, Jewish student unions, NCSY and United Synagogue Youth.

"Teens are encouraged to register at Jserve.ca where they will be asked to choose a project from among several service opportunities," says Kevin Goodman, program director at BBYO.

J-Serve Toronto's service options include creating no-sew fleece blankets for distribution to Haitian refugees; assembling tzedakah box kits for the Zareinu Educational Centre; beading bracelets to be sold by JACS to fund its work; assisting Reena residents with gardening, baking and crafts; making calls at Hadassah-WIZO's campaign telethon; hosting a sing-along with residents of Cummer Lodge; and working with Shari's Mission at a bone marrow drive.

The day starts at Council House at 11:30 a.m. with an orientation and refreshments, followed by an address from Rabbi Jared Grover of Beth Tikvah Synagogue to frame the day's activities. Buses will take the teens to their pre-selected service sites from 1 to 4 p.m., and then back to Council House for a wrap-up party that includes an inspirational talk by Robin Mednick of Pencils For Kids.

"This is the perfect chance to give back to our community that gives us so much, and to come together as a generation passionate about tikkun olam, repairing the world," says Rochelle Derlick, a Grade 12 student and BBYO member. "There are so many different project options, making it easy to individualize the experience while... making the world a better place."

The Toronto initiative is one of over 40 J-Serve projects internationally where teens will have the opportunity to fulfil the Jewish values of gemilut chasadim, acts of loving kindness; tzedakah, charitable giving; and tikkum olam.

J-Serve is the Jewish service component of the annual Global Youth Service Day of Youth Service America and is a collaboration of PANIM: The Institute of BBYO and Repair the World, with generous support from the Charles and Lynn Shusterman Family Foundation.

"All of us who share a devotion and commitment to the Jewish future should be moved and inspired by the thousands of Jewish teens who are volunteering to repair their communities and our world through J-Serve," says Lynn Schusterman, chair of the Charles and Lynn Schusterman Family Foundation. "Through their efforts, they are helping to make service a central part of North American Jewish life."

For more information or to register for J-Serve Toronto as either a teen participant or an adult chaperone, visit www.jserve.ca or Goodman at kgoodman@bbyo.ca or 416-398-2004, extension 222.

SALTY TRAVELLER: Associated Hebrew Schools senior kindergarten student Daniel Swartz brought back salt from the Dead Sea to share with his classmates while they learned about Israel for Yom Ha'atzmaut. He's also holding the passport he prepared for his in-class mock trip to Israel.

Obituary

Canadian Chabad leader dies at 94

Compiled by CJN Staff

MONTREAL — Rabbi Moshe Elye Gerlitzky, one of the founders of the Chabad-Lubavitch movement in Canada, died April 4 at age 94.

Rabbi Gerlitzky, who was active until nearly the end of his life, was described by Chabad as the movement's oldest emissary. He was among a group of nine Chassidim, refugees from Nazi-occupied Poland via Japan and China, who in 1941, established the Rabbinical College of Canada in Montreal, a day school that was open to boys of different backgrounds. Rabbi Gerlitzky was its first talmudic studies instructor.

He and his colleagues owed their life to the Japanese diplomat Chiune Sugihara, who, while posted in Vilnius, Lithuania, during World War II, helped thousands of Jews find safe haven.

Rabbi Gerlitzky was born in 1916 in Lodz, Poland. When he was 10 years old, he recited his first Blessing of the Sun, a springtime prayer ritual that takes place every 28 years. More than eight decades later, he recited the same blessing in a pre-Passover ceremony last year, making him one of the few people to have taken part in the tradition four times.

He earned a reputation as a diligent student at the Tomchei Tmimim Lubavitch yeshiva in Lodz, and became known for his bright smile and charitable manner.

When he was 17, he transferred to the central Lubavitch yeshiva in Warsaw, where he was later ordained. He spent the High Holidays with the sixth Lubavitcher Rebbe, Rabbi Yosef Yitzchak Schneersohn, in the suburb of Otwock. The experience, which included observing hours of study and prayer, had a profound effect on the young Rabbi Gerlitzky. Years later, he could repeat by heart the Rebbe's discourses.

At the outset of World War II, Rabbi Gerlitzky and two friends left Lodz, where he was teaching, for Warsaw. There, the Rebbe gave them American money to pay to be smuggled across the border to Russia.

Once in Russia, they made their way to Vilnius, and joined the Lubavitch yeshiva there while they knocked on the doors of foreign diplomatic offices for transit visas. Along with thousands of others, they came to the Japanese consulate, where Sugihara issued them visas to travel through Japan and on to North America.

According to a colleague, Rabbi Volf Greenglass, also a Chabad-Lubavitch founder in Montreal, his friend never lost his positive outlook, even as the prospects of surviving seemed grim.

"We lost everything," Rabbi Greenglass said. "We lost our families, our belongings and the roof over our heads. It was his lively spirit that maintained us and kept us going during our long and difficult journey until we came to Montreal."

Travelling across Russia via the Trans-Siberian Railroad, Rabbi Gerlitzky made it through Japan and on to Shanghai, China. From there, he joined eight other students, eventually heading to Montreal, where they arrived in 1941.

A year after his arrival, Rabbi Gerlitzky married Chana Rosenblum. At the request of Rabbi Schneersohn, the couple started a school for girls a few years later, and the first class held in their home was the genesis of today's Beth Rivkah Academy.

In the 1950s, Rabbi Gerlitzky started visiting Atlantic Canada to bolster Jewish life there.

"He travelled by bus, by train and on foot," said Harold Medjuck, a native of Halifax, where the rabbi visited at least once a year. "He travelled a long distance, he had a lot of miles to cover, a lot of people to see.

"His smile, his appearance, his sparkling eyes, his magnetic personality – we were drawn to him as to a fireplace on a winter day."

He is survived by eight children and over 300 grandchildren and great-grandchildren.

Many of those descendants today serve as Jewish educators and Chabad-Lubavitch emissaries across the globe.

Manitoba NDP gov't blocks vote to denounce IAW

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — A private member's resolution denouncing Israeli Apartheid Week that was tabled in the Manitoba legislature last week didn't come to a vote when the NDP government blocked it, calling the move "unhelpful."

The resolution, introduced by Progressive Conservative MLA Heather Stefanson on behalf of the PC caucus and PC Opposition Leader Hugh McFadyen, called on the legislature "to denounce Israeli Apartheid Week as divisive, promoting intolerance and undermining a balanced debate of the Israeli-Palestinian question."

The rules of the Manitoba legislature state that a private member's bill doesn't automatically come to a vote, and the PC caucus asked the Speaker to grant leave for a vote, which required the agreement of the NDP government.

The government refused to grant leave and later ran out the clock on the resolution by speaking about it until noon. Despite Stefanson's request, the government also refused to extend the clock on the resolution past noon and allow it to come to a recorded vote.

"By speaking out the resolution, the NDP killed it," McFadyen said in an interview afterward.

In the legislature, Gord Mackintosh, minister of family services and consumer affairs, said that while applying the term "apartheid" to Israel was "profoundly unhelpful" and "unwelcome speech" it was speech "likely protected" by the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

"The resolution asks the government to take a formal role in 'denunciating' the speech of certain Manitobans," Mackintosh said. "The resolution is speaking outside, then, of the existing civil and criminal laws and the Human Rights Code of Manitoba."

He rejected the notion that it is the "new function for provincial governments of the day in Canada to formally denounce and chill unwelcome speech… I am then at risk of being their next target."

Referring to Mackintosh's comments, McFadyen said, "If proponents [of IAW] can make a statement advocating it, then why can't we as a House be able to make a statement condemning it?… Had the resolution been voted on and passed, it would not have had binding legislative effect on a university. It would not have prevented anyone's free speech. But it would have sent a powerful declaratory message about what we as a legislature think about the event. It would have been our statement."

David Chomiak, minister of innovation, energy and mines, said in the legislature that he didn't agree to granting leave for the resolution to be voted on because he didn't want to give the IAW event credibility.

After saying that the "A-word" [apartheid] does "not apply to Israel in any shape or form," Chomiak said IAW in Manitoba was "a non-event," and that by "voting on this… we give a platform for those who failed."

McFadyen, however, told The CJN that "it's not as if we are talking about two eccentrics on a street corner" who are putting on IAW. He said IAW is an organized event by those with a "clear agenda to undermine the right of Israel to exist as a state."

Stefanson noted that a "similar motion in Ontario was supported by politicians of all political stripes."

Jon Gerrard, leader of the Liberal party in Manitoba and its only MLA, supported the resolution.

McFadyen said his party and the NDP were in negotiations for a "couple of weeks" trying to agree on wording for a resolution.

Premier Greg Selinger was absent from the legislature when the resolution was debated. Brian Letour, IAW spokesperson in Manitoba, told The CJN that "we sent about 150 petitions to the government against Stefanson's resolution."

Canadian people, IDF unit honoured

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The Canadian Friends of Meir Medical Centre will honour the people of Canada and the Israel Defence Forces' medical and rescue team for coming to the aid of the people of Haiti following a devastating earthquake last January.

The Meir 2010 Humanitarian Award of Distinction "recognizes the outstanding contributions that the honorees have made toward the rescue and the relief of suffering of the Haitian people, as well as to the rebuilding of that devastated nation."

The award will be presented at a gala dinner at the Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue in the fall.

Representatives of the IDF rescue team, which included doctors from the Meir Medical Centre, are expected to attend the presentation, as well as yet-to-be-determined Canadians, said Arie Raif, president of the Friends group.

Canada and Israel were among the first nations to respond to the earthquake that devastated Haiti last winter, with Israel dispatching an IDF field hospital to Port-au-Prince. It was among the first functioning field hospitals and "it was able to save hundreds of Haitian lives and treat more than 500 Haitians a day," Raif said.

Altogether, the seven-person medical team performed 319 surgeries and delivered 16 babies, three by Caesarian section. Among the IDF medical personnel were three doctors from the Meir Medical Centre, he said.

In addition to offering emergency medical services, the IDF unit "took to Haiti 30 tons of medical equipment, including two incubators, more than 1,000 blankets, 30 large tents, mattresses, sleeping bags, kitchen equipment and a K-9 [dog] rescue unit that helped find four individuals trapped under rubble," Raif said.

The award also recognizes the generosity of the Canadian people, who raised more than $150 million, most of which was matched by the federal government. "It was an amazing response," Raif said.

At the same time, the Canadian Forces' DART (Disaster Assistance Response Team) provided up to 50,000 litres of potable water a day.

IDF soldiers saved lives in Haiti

Raif, a former Israeli diplomat, said that in addition to honouring worthy recipients, the award will showcase an important aspect of the IDF. "It's about time we defuse the wrong image and perception of the IDF," he said. "This [deployment in Haiti] followed the Cast Lead operation [in Gaza] and the false accusations against it. This is a humanitarian army and they deserve the award."

Canadian Friends of the Meir Medical Centre was established about four years ago to boost the profile and raise money for the facility, located in Kfar Saba, northeast of Tel Aviv. The centre serves close to one million people per year – both Arabs and Jews.

A teaching hospital that operates in cooperation with Tel Aviv University's medical school, Meir Medical is known for cancer research, treating diabetes, orthopedic surgery, geriatric care and head and neck surgery. Medical personnel publish about 200 scientific papers every year, Raif said.

The Canadian Friends group raised more than $1.2 million for the hospital last year.

Coverage of nuclear summit focuses on terror

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

With very few exceptions, the coverage of the two-day Nuclear Security Summit, held in Washington D.C. early last week, remained focused on the summit's stated goal: to secure loose nuclear material worldwide and prevent it from falling into the hands of terrorist groups.

While there had been reports in the lead-up to the summit that Turkey and Egypt planned to make an issue of Israel's non-participation in the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty – ostensibly one reason Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu decided not to attend, and to send his deputy, Dan Meridor, instead – in the end, Israel wasn't singled out as feared.

Instead, attention was focused on what U.S. President Barack Obama said April 11, on the eve of the summit: "The single greatest threat to U.S. security, both short-term, medium-term and long-term, would be the possibility of a terrorist organization obtaining a nuclear weapon... We know that organizations like Al Qaeda are in the process of trying to secure nuclear weapons or other weapons of mass destruction, and would have no compunction at using them."

However, as Steven Hurst and Anne Gearan of the Associated Press reported April 12, Obama's sense of urgency about the imminent threat of nuclear terrorism isn't shared by all, and particularly not by some whose nuclear arsenals are most vulnerable. They noted that at an unofficial conference of 200 international nuclear experts (also held in Washington at the same time as the summit), well-known Pakistani physicist Pervez Hoodbhoy remarked: "Unfortunately, I do not see this concern either in Pakistan or in India about nuclear terrorism. Both countries do not see the seriousness of the situation."

This indifference is especially worrisome to those experts who warn that Pakistan's expanding nuclear arsenal (which Pakistan claims is needed for "deterrence" – a reference to its enemy, India) could fall into the hands of Al Qaeda, given the instability in that country and in South Asia generally.

Even though Obama has generally received commendation for convening a 47-nation summit (Iran, North Korea and Syria were not invited) to tackle the nuclear terrorism threat, there has also been criticism that since the summit's declaration about securing weapons-usable nuclear material within four years is non-binding, it is, accordingly, of limited effectiveness.

The challenge for the United States and the international community is immense. As the Globe and Mail's Konrad Yakabuski wrote from Washington (April 14): "Indeed, Mr. Obama has so far made no progress in containing the biggest non-terror-related atomic threats – nuclear buildup in India and Pakistan, the prospect of nuclear-capable Iran and an obdurate North Korea. Mr. Obama talked tough [April 13] on pursuing sanctions against Iran, but in the same breath acknowledged that China's dependence on Iranian oil is still an obstacle to getting a UN Security Council resolution with any teeth."

A rare instance of sustained attention on Israel at this time was Patrick Martin's April 13 article, "Universal assumption is that Israel has nuclear weapons," filed from Jerusalem. Martin wrote that Netanyahu's decision not to attend the Washington conference drew attention to the "question of Israel's alleged nuclear arsenal."

Martin's own question, "Does Israel have nuclear weapons?" appears to be rhetorical since, as he noted, despite Israel's policy of ambiguity (neither affirming nor denying having an arsenal), "it is universally assumed that Israel does, in fact, have nuclear weapons." So there's nothing new in mentioning this long-assumed "open secret."

More controversially, Martin wrote that "Ironically, the universal assumption that Israel possesses nuclear weapons may have contributed to Iran's desire to also possess the bomb." The phrase "may have contributed" has its own ambiguity, as it leaves open the possibility that it may not have contributed.

In fact, the evidence is overwhelming that Iran's pursuit of nuclear weapons was motivated by factors unconnected to Israel's program – namely, Tehran's pursuit of regional hegemony (which is as much a threat to Sunni-dominated Arab states as it is to Israel, a country Iran has repeatedly threatened to destroy).

The prospect that Iran could soon develop nuclear weapons and place nuclear material in the hands of terrorist organizations such as Hezbollah is what keeps people, including many Arabs, awake at night.

Students learn Jewish leadership in school

"We have probably one of the most pro-Israel governments in the history of Canada right now," he said. "Hopefully, they will use their good reputation and good standing within the Jewish community to try to broker a deal or get more involved."

Additionally, many of the students involved currently take a Torah High class about Jewish leadership, so it's also important for them to see their work make a difference, he said.

In the past, he said, students have sent petitions to the offices of MPs or the prime minister, with each petition also having about 250 signatures. However, having the petition go through Parliament makes it a lot more public, he said.

He said he hopes this experience inspires students to get involved in Israel advocacy.

"We're teaching them about activism before they even reach university, which is where it really starts," he said, adding that many Torah High alumni are involved in Israel advocacy groups on campuses.

Aaron Miller, a Grade 10 student enrolled in a Torah High class, said he got involved with the petition because he's a big believer in Israel. Although they have presented the petition to Parliament, the teens will continue to raise awareness in every possible way, he said.

"To have a soldier that's kidnapped just doesn't seem right to me, and I think that we should do everything we can to try to get him back," he said.

Although this isn't the first petition of its kind, Poilievre emphasized the importance of persistence.

"Any time you highlight an injustice, you move towards resolving it, and we have to continue to raise our voices so that this is not forgotten," he said.

Israeli author to visit

Compiled by CJN Staff

OTTAWA — Israeli author Amir Gutfreund will speak at the Ottawa Writers Festival on April 25.

Gutfreund wrote his breakthrough novel, Our Holocaust, in 2001, based on his own experiences growing up as a child of Holocaust survivors. He will be introducing his new book, The World A Moment Later.

In an interview Gutfreund told the Israeli daily Ha'aretz: "Even if I write an instruction manual for a washing machine, it will always contain humour, and it will always contain the Holocaust. It's a part of me."

He also said that although he is proud, it's not easy to be an Israeli Jew. "What a burden it is to be born both Jewish and Israeli. It's like carrying five watermelons on your back all your life."

The World A Moment Later is the story of a European Jewish journalist who is sent to Palestine in 1918 to report about the lives of the Jewish pioneers. He has no intention of joining them, but is forced to remain when his newspaper is embezzled by its editor. The book is a tribute to the countless forgotten people who were among Israel's founders. Gutfreund will speak at the Lord Elgin Hotel, 100 Elgin St. at 10 a.m. and at the Mayfair Theatre, 1074 Bank St., at 4 p.m.

Israeli students win humanitarian meet

Compiled by CJN Staff

An Israeli team from the Interdisciplinary Center Herzliya took first place at the 2010 edition of the Jean-Pictet Competition on international humanitarian law held recently in Orford in the Eastern Townships.

The three Israelis beat out teams from 44 universities from 32 other countries.

The week-long competition, held March 20 to 27, is intended for students in relevant fields, such as law and political science, or attending military academies at the undergraduate level or above, and is now in its 22nd year.

It consists of simulating legal cases before a professional jury, which evaluates the teams' theoretical knowledge and practical understanding of international humanitarian law.

This year's competition was chaired by Philippe Kirsch, who until last year was a judge of the International Criminal Court in The Hague and its first president.

"For an Israeli team to win a competition in the field in which Israel is so often criticized is significant," the team's academic supervisor Daphné Richemond-Barak is quoted as saying in the Jerusalem Post. "The Jean-Pictet is the most prestigious competition in the field worldwide."

Teams role-played as foreign affairs officials, military advocates or Red Cross representatives. The Israelis' coach, Ido Rosenzweig, summarized international humanitarian law as, "Do the most damage to the enemy [while] minimizing harm to civilians," and Israel, he said, has much experience in the laws of war.

The Israelis' training included access to the highest government officials. The students were Jonathan Braverman, Danielle Brown and Uri Feldman.

Their final round was against New York University and the Université de Montréal.

The Post reported that, after winning, the Israeli team received a five-minute standing ovation from the other teams, including those from Iran, Lebanon and Jordan. For the closing ceremony, the team waved an Israeli flag.

Robbins Hebrew Academy Harnesses "Learning Power" to Produce Successful 21st Century Graduates

Ask a kindergarten student from the Miriam and Larry Robbins Hebrew Academy (RHA) "What makes a good friend?". Not only will you get a variety of answers, you will also hear how and why they came up with their answers. This is the power of critical thinking, and one of the reasons RHA is now competing with the top private schools in Toronto.

In the past year alone, RHA, formerly United Synagogue Day School (USDS), has increased literacy levels, improved oral French skills and integrated school-wide critical thinking challenges every six weeks, in both General and Judaic Studies. These successes come on the heels of a $4 million endowment by Larry Robbins, ensuring the sustainability of the school for generations to come.

RHA, building on the strong foundations established by USDS, is pursuing a variety of initiatives to ensure its students are well positioned to succeed beyond its doors.

The first Jewish day school in Toronto to employ SMART Boards in each of its classrooms, RHA continues to embrace new technological innovations to actively engage students in the learning process. With the enthusiastic support of an active parent-body, RHA is poised to prepare its graduates for success in professions that may not even exist yet, using technologies that have not even been invented.

"We began with the portrait of a 21st Century Graduate, and then built the vision for the school with this end-result in mind," said Claire Sumerlus, Head of School at Robbins Hebrew Academy. "Developing and implementing critical thinking skills is just one example of what we have been doing to increase our students' "learning power". The ability to thoughtfully assess and determine the best course of action for a given situation is not just an academic skill; it is a fundamental life skill."

The RHA vision extends well beyond desks and chairs, encouraging social responsibility and mindful living. "Our role as educators," Ms. Sumerlus added, "is not just to teach our students math or language or history, but to prepare them for both the challenges and successes they will encounter throughout their lives — academically, professionally and personally."

United Synagogue Day School, which officially changed its name to the Miriam and Larry Robbins Hebrew Academy (RHA) on Thursday, April 15th, 2010, was founded in 1961 and is a member of the Solomon Schechter Day School Association. RHA offers Nursery through grade 8 General and Judaic studies at its two campuses in the Greater Toronto Area. For information go to www.rhacademy.ca.

Israel's democracy has recently been challenged in areas such as gender equality, the delegitimization of human rights organizations, and the scope and composition of the Supreme Court. Parizeau leaves Montreal's JGH

Compiled by CJN Staff

MONTREAL — Former Quebec premier Jacques Parizeau was discharged from Montreal's Jewish General Hospital (JGH) April 14 after a 10-day stay.

In a statement, the hospital said that Parizeau, 79, was in "good" medical condition, but requires several weeks of convalescence.

Throughout his confinement, the hospital has respected Parizeau and his family's request for privacy. JGH representatives did not give interviews, and asked hospital staff not to comment. The hospital, however, provided regular updates to the media.

Many saw irony in Parizeau's choice of hospital, given his remark on the night of the 1995 sovereignty referendum that the "yes" side lost because of "money and the ethnic vote."

Parizeau was admitted on April 5 reportedly after a drop in blood pressure. Within two days, his condition was described as stable and improving, and he was being kept under observation.

Na'amat's Club Masada celebrates 65 years

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Hannah Freedman has been a Zionist since birth, which is why she helped found Club Masada 65 years ago.

The club, which celebrated its 65th anniversary last week, is part of Na'amat Canada, an organization that raises money for social services that support women and children in Israel.

Masada members, most of whom are more than 60 years old, started Adopt-a-Child, a program that financially supports day cares in Israel, as well as Dollars for David, a Chanukah fundraiser that collects money for needy children in Israel.

"I was a Zionist, raising money for Israel, long before it became [popular]," Freedman said, adding that her mother was part of the Pioneer Women, a Zionist organization that later turned into Na'amat Canada.

For Freedman, supporting a Jewish state was natural.

"As far as I was concerned, it would be an insult to my mother [not to]."

Club Masada originally started with 12 members. They ran fashion shows, teas, garage sales and movie nights, all to raise money to support a Jewish state. Now, 65 years later, the group has more than 50 members.

"Everybody was very enthusiastic and they still are. They're a lot of old ladies, and they're doing marvellous work," Freedman said.

Pamela Goldfarb, a Na'amat Canada Toronto member and chair of Adopt-a-Child, agrees.

"They're one of the older groups, but they have done so much," she said at the banquet in Club Masada's honour, held April 14 at Beth David Bnai Israel Beth Am Synagogue. The banquet, which had about 180 guests, raised $50,000 for Adopt-a-Child.

"[Club Masada] started as a group before Israel was a country. They had such remarkable vision and belief," Goldfarb added. "They inspire everyone else, and they really mentor them."

For Tillie Margolis, Club Masada's president, the group is about more than just fundraising. It's about building bonds.

"We have so many members, we have meetings every two weeks. We keep in touch – if a member doesn't come, we call them," she said.

"It gives you a feeling of closeness. If there's a death in the family, everyone visits. We've known each other for a long time."

Margolis joined Club Masada 60 years ago, soon after getting married.

"[They] said, 'You must join.' It snowballed from there," she said. "This is a wonderful thing, having reached this point."

Lorraine Levene, executive director of Toronto's Na'amat Canada chapter, looks up to Club Masada members.

"They're our largest group. They raise the most money. Their belief is you have to give before you ask to give," she said. "There is not a member in their group that does not give something. In their hearts, they feel they have to help."

Tillie Margolis, Club Masada's president, celebrated the club's 65th anniversary last week at Beth David Bnai Israel Beth Am Synagogue.

Who's at fault in the case of a delinquent kid?

Family Matters

Question: My child only attends school when she feels like it, and that's not very often. She is currently 16 going on 17, and lives with her boyfriend most of the time. Am I still obligated to pay child support to the custodial parent?

Answer: If you can prove that she lives with her boyfriend most of the time and is delinquent in school you may be able to persuade a judge to stop child support. But demonstrating that a child is no longer within parental control and has dropped out of school is far more difficult than it sounds. What does "only attends school when she feels like it" really mean? How many courses is she taking? Is she registered as a full-time or part-time student? Is she passing each course or failing?

It may be that she is a poor student who is registered for full time courses but hasn't exactly failed. It may also be that she spends two or three nights a week with her boyfriend and the rest of the week with her mother. Everything depends on the extent of her independence from her mom and just how often she misses school.

My question to you, sir, is how did it happen that a 16 year old girl is finding comfort in a sexual relationship so early in life and is so often absent from school? And what did you do to contribute to this state of affairs? Rather than worry about how quickly you can shave a few bucks off your child support, are you perhaps asking the wrong question? What are you doing to help your daughter? How often have you spoken to the school teachers or principal about getting her help? What can you do to re-establish the relationship that appears to have gone sour?

Fatherless children turn into young adults who often become troubled parents themselves, leading to fatter wallets for divorce lawyers like me. No doubt there is more than one parent or the child to blame, but heaven help us if we don't start asking the right questions.

Warm hugs greet Reena clients at Beth Torah Congregation

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Saturday has become the favourite day of the week for Reena clients and staff who live at 40 Elway Court, says Sarah Boyd, a Reena support worker.

"We dress up and attend Shabbat services at Beth Torah Congregation," Boyd said.

Reena is an agency that supports people with developmental disabilities.

"In a society where our population is often greeted with trepidation, and sometimes even disdain, the congregation at Beth Torah has quite literally opened its arms and embraced us into their midst," Boyd said.

"Beth Torah Congregation lives and breathes integration, tolerance and compassion."

Boyd said that when the group arrives at the synagogue, located at 47 Glenbrook Ave., they are warmly greeted and guided to their seats. Clients have been invited up to read and participate in returning the Torah scroll to the ark.

Beth Torah's Purim Carnival

She noted their excitement and said that "the participants talk about it for days afterwards."

Beth Torah's spiritual leader, Rabbi Yossi Sapirman, preaches tolerance, compassion and good judgment, she said. "This is reflected in the synagogue's open-door policy toward our clients."

Referring to his shul's recently completed building campaign and renovation, Rabbi Sapirman told The CJN, "We are a welcoming community, and the congregants of Beth Torah recognize that 'Completing the Dream' did only happen when all were included and our remarkable new facility was accessible to all."

Boyd said that she also gets something from the experience.

"Even though I'm not Jewish, I always come away with a nugget of spiritual wisdom from Rabbi Sapirman's sermons, which are finely crafted and often very humourous," she said.

At the end of the service, Cantor David Young invites several of the Reena clients up to the reading platform to sing with him and the choir.

She said Reena client Sharon Abramowitz has been known to wave her arms in the air and conduct the choir and the rest of the congregation in the songs at the end of the Shabbat services.

Boyd added that Abramowitz "literally beams with joy as she sings Ya'aseh Shalom."

And at the conclusion of the service, the group is invited upstairs for a delicious and healthy Kiddush lunch. "This gives our clients a chance to socialize with the members of the congregation, some of whom greet them with familiar hellos and warm hugs," Boyd said.

"The clients love attending the services and love the singing and the music. They look forward to each Shabbat."

The Reena clients are also welcomed to other Beth Torah events.

"We particularly enjoyed the Purim carnival, where they participated in the games and enjoyed the refreshments," Boyd said.

Last year, Reena clients joined a group from Beth Torah on UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Walk for Israel.

On April 22, the shul will receive a Community Inclusion Award of Excellence from Itanu Toronto, federation's "Inclusion Initiative," whose mission is "a more inclusive Jewish community where people with special needs are able to fully participate in educational, spiritual, communal, social and recreational activities."

'We won't stop working to bring home Gilad'

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel will continue its efforts to bring home abducted Israel Defence Forces soldier Gilad Schalit, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said on Monday at a Memorial Day ceremony in Jerusalem dedicated to the victims of terror attacks.

"We won't stop taking action to bring Gilad Schalit home," said Netanyahu, who also took the opportunity to call on Schalit's captors to release him.

Schalit was captured by Hamas in a 2006 cross-border raid and believed to be held in Gaza.

Netanyahu addressed the families of terror victims, saying, "We commemorate the memory of thousands of terror victims murdered in attacks against Israel.

"The only sin committed by these victims, was that they lived in Israel, or visited Israel. But [the attackers] weren't sticklers – they killed Israelis outside of Israel, too. The murderers slaughtered them only because of their identity."

The prime minister added that Israel will extend its hands to "anyone who wishes to live with us in peace, but those who wish us ill, and those who kill our children, we will pursue everywhere and exact revenge for their hatred and their crimes."

In this comment, Netanyahu echoed sentiments he uttered several hours earlier at the national Memorial Day ceremony at the Mount Herzl cemetery, during which he had said, "We are a peace-seeking nation who prays for peace."

The prime minister addressed Israel's efforts to achieve peace with its neighbours, saying that "our one hand is extended in offering peace to our willing neighbours, while the other wields a sword to protect ourselves against from those who seek to destroy us.

"On this day, the entire nation is embracing the mothers, fathers, brothers and sisters, the sons, daughters and wives of the great big bereaved family," Netanyahu said.

"Our loss is greater than we can bear," he added. "Our only comfort is to continue our loved ones' path and to keep their memory alive."

Netanyahu, who lost his own brother, Yoni, in a military operation to free airline hostages in Uganda in 1976, addressed the bereaved families in attendance saying "my brothers and sisters, members of bereaved families, every family has its own way of dealing with the loss. I remember once when I saw my mother sitting in an armchair in the living room of my parents' house staring off into the distance when suddenly a smile passed over her face. I asked her, 'What are you thinking about?' and she said 'I'm thinking about Yoni. I have only good memories.'"

Israelis across the country stood in silence for two minutes on Monday morning to remember the 22,684 soldiers and civilians who were killed in Israel's wars and terror attacks since the beginning of modern Zionism up until today.

Following the two-minute siren at 11 a.m., Memorial Day ceremonies began in military cemeteries across the nation. Some 1.5 million visitors were expected to attend the various ceremonies Monday.

On Sunday, Netanyahu addressed a ceremony for Israel's Memorial Day at Jerusalem's Ammunition Hill, saying that Israel has learned that peace can only be achieved if it remains strong and prepared to defend itself.

"Over the years, we have learned that the olive branch of peace will be achieved only if we remain strong, only if we are prepared to defend ourselves in the same way our fallen soldiers did at this site," he told the crowd. "They attacked from this site and other hills not out of lust for war, but out of belief in the righteousness of the goal of defending the Jewish people's one and only country."

Netanyahu also stressed the importance of Jerusalem, saying, "Twice we have paid a heavy price to relieve the siege on Jerusalem – the first time during the War of Independence, and the second time when the city was bombarded during the Six Day War. Jerusalem – which was then a withered, divided city – has returned to being a city full of life."

Since those wars, he added, not a day has passed when Israel did not extend its hand in peace to its neighbours, "and our hand is still outstretched."

At 8 p.m. Sunday night, Israel fell silent for one minute as sirens wailed across the country to mark the start of Memorial Day. President Shimon Peres then lit a memorial flame at the official ceremony at the Western Wall plaza in Jerusalem and addressed Israel's bereaved families, saying that Israel seeks peace, but will defend itself in case of war.

"On this blessed occasion, I want to say in the name of the state of Israel at large: We do not seek war," Peres told the families. "We are a nation that yearns for peace, but knows, and will always know, how to defend itself."

Nothing, he told the families, can compensate for the loss of a loved one. "I am aware that nothing can compensate for the sound of your son's steps, which you expect to hear on the staircase, but have suddenly gone silent," Peres said. "Facing your tormented eyes, I am at a loss for words."

However, he added, "Israel's strength springs from the strength of its faith, and its greatness emanates from the heroism of its sons. Today we grieve for their loss and are blessed by their legacy."

Noting that Israel still faces threats, he warned those who seek to harm it not to "belittle our capabilities."

"There are still those who wish to annihilate us," Peres said. "At their head is the autocratic Iranian regime that seeks to impose its rule on the Middle East, silence it with lethal weapons and launch an anti-Israel incitement campaign to deflect Arab fears."

Though alone among the nations, he continued, "we had the good fortune to have sons that defended us with great courage. Alone we won seven wars and emerged from them stronger and more determined.

"We are a democratic country, with many divisions and chasms, internal disagreements and wrangling, yet we are also a nation that knows how to stand united and put aside the bickering in times of need, to defend itself and inflict a resounding defeat on those who wish to destroy us."

He ended by thanking all those who have defended Israel and their families. "We want to express our gratitude, from the bottom of our hearts, to the youths who are no more, whom you raised and in whom you instilled the values that made them what they were until their last breath," he said. "It is their courage that gave our people the strength to face the challenges ahead – not to fear the enemy, not to cease building, not to lose faith in the peace to come. And it will come."

'Don't push Israel into corner,' former Israeli minister warns

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

"We're talking about spilling a drop of ink and not a drop of blood," former Israeli deputy defence minister Ephraim Sneh said last week in advocating immediate sanctions when asked what needs to be done to stop Iran from becoming a nuclear power.

Sneh was speaking on an April 12 conference call hosted by The Israel Project (TIP), a Washington, D.C.-based, non-profit think-tank and pro-Israel advocacy group.

The call took place on Yom Hazikaron and during last week's U.S.-hosted nuclear security summit in Washington. The summit's goal was to discuss and fast-track international sanctions against countries who threaten nuclear terrorism, particularly Iran.

Sneh, a former Labor MK and current head of the Israel Hazaka party, cautioned his listeners – composed chiefly of U.S. media – that stringent, hard-hitting, U.S.-led economic sanctions must be implemented right away in order to deter Iran's nuclear ambitions and foment a brewing internal revolution that would likely depose the dictatorial Iranian regime.

Barring these actions, Sneh said, Israel would have to consider taking action against Iran before it became an "unacceptable" existential threat to the Jewish state.

Ephraim Sneh

This will happen sooner than later, he added.

"The main lesson of the Holocaust is that we cannot ignore the combination of a regime with an ideology of hatred combined with a colossal military build-up. This is what happened in Germany with Hitler, and what is going on now with [Iranian President Mahmoud] Ahmadinejad," he said.

"Israel is a country that cannot live even one day under the shadow of an Iranian nuclear bomb, because a reality will be created that Israel will no longer serve as a safe haven to Jews and as a state with excellence of entrepreneurship. We will suffer a brain drain."

He said Iran continues to build centrifuges that will allow it to have enough highly enriched uranium to create a bomb.

"If something is [not] done soon to stop Iran's [nuclear enrichment program] or to topple its regime, [Israel] will be compelled to do something. This is the main thing I would like the people of the U.S. to understand," said Sneh, a physician who has served as Israel's minister of health and as minister of transportation.

Asked whether he thought the U.S. would impose harsh sanctions in time, Sneh said "this is the big question." He said America has the legislation ready and could do something if the political will was there.

"It's a matter of understanding there is no more time to waste. Iran's centrifuges keep spinning," he said. "There is no change in [Israel's] attitude that Iran is close to reaching the point of no return."

In his talk, Sneh said Iran may produce enough fissile material for a nuclear bomb by September.

Speaking about the threat of terrorist groups such as Hamas and Hezbollah – both supported by Iran – Sneh said these organizations would become emboldened in their activities if Iran became a nuclear power.

He said the current Iranian regime is based on a "visceral hatred not only of Israel" but of all democratic societies.

Sneh said he doesn't consider a military attack on Iran to be a first option. "It's the last resort. We need to avoid this. We can take sanctions that are cheap and bloodless.

"If companies all over the world knew that if they invest in the Iranian oil and gas industry, or sell refined petroleum products to Iran… that they would never again be able to do business in the U.S., the U.K., Australia, France or Canada, this is a threat that no sane executive in the world would take. By doing so, we may bring about the implosion of the Iranian regime. And let me be frank: the purpose of sanctions is not just to avoid Iranian nuclear bombs. It's to get rid of this horrible regime, which is cruel and brutal at home and spreading terrorism abroad."

In conclusion, Sneh said the West needs to appeal to all Middle Eastern countries who don't want to be "slaves to Iran's nuclear blackmail empire," such as Bahrain, Oman, the United Arab Emirates and other Gulf states. He said as soon as "real" sanctions are declared by the United States, all these countries should also join the initiative.

But he warned that the world shouldn't "push Israel into a corner where we have no other option" but to act against Iran.

Western Wall invalidates ad

The authority banned the ad, telling the Israeli Government Tourist Office not to imply that places in the occupied territories were part of the State of Israel.

The Tourism Ministry responded that the present legal status of Jerusalem was irrelevant unless there was an unnecessary attempt to "interpret the straightforward message of the ad in a manner that went beyond what consumers were likely to understand from the ad."

Another tourism ad was banned last year following letters of complaint about a map in the ad that included the West Bank, the Golan Heights and the Gaza Strip as part of Israel.

Campaign seeks N. American heirs to Shoah assets

BY ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff reporter

Israel has $250 million (US) in assets waiting to be claimed by North American heirs of Shoah victims.

That's according to an ad campaign launched last week in Canada and the United States by the Israeli-based Company for Restitution of Holocaust Victims' Assets.

The hopes to locate heirs to Israeli assets originally purchased by Jews who died in the Holocaust.

Ads calling on heirs to come forward are now running in Jewish newspapers in North America and on Jewish websites. It's believed that many of the investors or their descendants made their way to the United States and Canada after the war.

Speaking to The CJN from Israel last week, Jeremy Ruden, international spokesperson for the restitution program, said he hoped heirs in Canada and the United States will take advantage of this opportunity.

As of last week, his organization had received "very little" feedback from North Americans, though it was still early in the campaign, Ruden said.

About 55 per cent of the assets are in real estate, 20 per cent in bank accounts, another 20 per cent in shares and stocks and the rest in artwork and valuables, he said.

A plot of land in central Israel, an example of unclaimed real estate in Israel.

"We want people to come to our website and hopefully make a claim," Ruden said.

Although it's unclear how long this new North American campaign will continue, Ruden said that any money or assets left unclaimed "in the long term" will eventually go to survivors and to Holocaust education programs in Israel.

Throughout the first half of the 20th century, hundreds of European Jews invested in what was then Palestine. Following World War II, many of the assets were never claimed. Included in these assets are untouched plots of land, unclaimed bank accounts and shares from the Jewish Colonial Trust – the parent company of the Anglo Palestine Bank which later became Bank Leumi – as well as other Israeli financial institutions.

The Restitution of Holocaust Victims' Assets – the Israel-based organization that launched the campaign – has compiled lists of these assets and is working to make the process of returning the belongings to their beneficiaries as easy as possible.

Set up by the State of Israel, the organization was established in 2006 to provide historical justice to the victims of the Holocaust and reinstate the assets with their legal heirs. Its establishment followed criticism of Israel for not doing enough to find the rightful heirs of Israeli assets. There are currently some 55,000 unclaimed assets on the organization's list.

Its website, Hashava.org.il/eng, contains additional information on submitting an application to request restitution of an asset on the list.

It also provides a user-friendly search feature for family name input.

Goldstone barred from grandson's bar mitzvah

JTA

CAPE TOWN, South Africa – South African judge Richard Goldstone is being barred from attending his grandson' s bar mitzvah.

Following negotiations between the South African Zionist Federation (SAZF) and the Beth Hamedrash Hagadol in Sandton, an affluent suburb of Johannesburg where the event is due to take place, an agreement has been reached with the family. As a result, Goldstone will not be attending the synagogue service, scheduled for early next month.

Goldstone was the head of a United Nations-appointed commission that investigated last winter's Gaza war. The commission's final report accused Israel and Hamas of war crimes and said there may be evidence of crimes against humanity.

Richard Goldstone

Some of the role-players were tight-lipped when contacted by JTA, with Avrom Krengel, chairman of the SAZF, saying: "We understand that there's a bar mitzvah boy involved – we're very sensitive to the issues and at this stage there's nothing further to say."

Jewish groups had planned to organize a protest outside of the synagogue if Goldstone was in attendance, according to reports.

Reached in Washington where he is currently based, Goldstone was reluctant to comment save to say: "In the interests of my grandson, I've decided not to attend the ceremony at the synagogue."

Retired chief justice of South Africa Arthur Chaskalson said it was "disgraceful" to put pressure on a grandfather not to attend his grandson's bar mitzvah. "If it is correct that this has the blessing of the leadership of the Jewish community in South Africa, it reflects on them rather than Judge Goldstone. They should hang their heads in shame."

South Africa's Jewish umbrella body also criticized the decision to pressure Goldstone into not attending his grandson's bar mitzvah.

"The South African Jewish Board of Deputies… deeply regrets that a religious milestone has been politicized and disagrees with the manner in which this matter has been handled," a statement from the country's umbrella body said in a statement titled "In response to pressure resulting in Judge Richard Goldstone not attending his grandson's bar mitzvah.

"This position is in no way a comment on the merits or demerits of the Goldstone Commission and its subsequent report," the Board of Deputies said.

Israel Briefs

Peres criticizes Syria, Iran

Israeli President Shimon Peres criticized Syria and Iran during a visit to Paris. At a meeting April 12 with Prime Minister Francois Fillon, Peres said that "Syria continues its doublespeak. On the one hand it speaks about peace, and on the other hand it passes sophisticated Scud missiles to Hezbollah that threaten Israel. The transfer of arms from Syria to Hezbollah and Syria's support of terrorist organizations does not square with its declarations of seeking peace." On Iran, Peres said that "As Jews who experienced the Holocaust, the people of Israel cannot remain indifferent to Iran's desire to develop nuclear weapons. Nuclear weapons in the hands of a fascist government like Iran present a tangible threat to global peace. If Hitler had nuclear weapons, we would not sit here today." Peres and Paris Mayor Bertrand Delanoe inaugurated a new square near the Seine River, in the central part of the French capital, named the Ben-Gurion Esplanade.

Hezbollah coy on missiles

A Hezbollah government minister said April 16 that whether or not they have acquired Scud missiles is none of Israel's business. Hussein Haj Hassan said the group was always arming and preparing itself, but he refused to confirm or deny Israeli allegations that the militant Lebanese group has acquired Scud missiles. Earlier last week, Israeli president Shimon Peres accused Damascus of providing the Scud missiles, a charge Syria denied. The U.S. State Department responded April 14 by saying that if the allegations were true, they "would put Lebanon at a significant risk."

Olmert, now Lupolianski too

Former Israeli prime minister Ehud Olmert has denied that he was involved in a massive real estate scandal that has also led to the arrest of former Jerusalem mayor Uri Lupolianski. In a news conference last week, Olmert called police suspicion that he took a bribe, in what is being described as one of the worst corruption scandals in Israeli history, "a character assassination attempt that is unprecedented in its scope and might." Olmert was identified by police as the chief suspect in the Holyland project scandal. He's currently on trial in relation to other corruption charges. Lupolianski was arrested the same day in connection with the Holyland scandal. He's suspected of accepting $750,000 in bribes during the project's construction.

Hamas executes alleged spies

Hamas reportedly executed two Palestinians in Gaza convicted of collaborating with Israel. The men, convicted by a Gaza military court of treason for passing information to Israel, were executed April 15 by a firing squad. Reportedly, they are the first executions in Gaza since 2005, when Hamas took over the Strip, according to the Palestinian Ma'an news agency. Under Palestinian law, executions can only be carried out by authorization of the president. The executions, which were not approved by Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, are a Hamas challenge to Abbas' authority, Reuters reported. Palestinian human rights groups in Gaza and the West Bank had appealed to Hamas not to carry out the executions.

Israeli allowed to visit Beirut

Israel's Supreme Court has given an Israeli-Arab writer permission to visit Beirut to attend an Arab writers' conference. Ala Halihal from the northern Israeli city of Akko appealed to Israel's Supreme Court after Interior Minister Eli Yishai refused to allow the trip. Asked by the court to respond to the petition, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said he also opposed the visit. It's illegal for Israeli citizens to visit Lebanon, which is considered an enemy state.

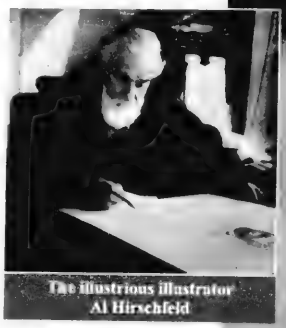
Documentary examines Hollywood family dynasty

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Thanks to the generally first-rate films at this year's Toronto Jewish Film Festival, movie buffs are in for a treat.

The Brothers Warner charts the rise and fall of a family dynasty in Hollywood. The four Warner brothers, Harry, Jack, Albert and Sam, founded and administered a studio whose gritty and socially relevant films ranged from Casablanca and Rebel Without Cause to Giant and The Adventures of Robin Hood. Cass Warner's intriguing documentary, based on archival footage and interviews, examines their lives and impact on American culture. She has a personal interest in the topic, having been Harry's granddaughter.



The illustrious illustrator Al Hirschfeld

The Warners – the sons of Russian Jewish immigrants who briefly lived in London, Ont. – were genuine pioneers. They made The Jazz Singer, the first talkie, in 1927. It was phenomenally successful, having been Hollywood's biggest moneymaker until Gone With the Wind in 1939. As she suggests, the Warners were fond of "message films." For example, I Am a Fugitive From a Chain Gang prompted prison reform in the United States, while The Public Enemy showed that crime does not pay.

On the eve of World War II, the Warners produced Hollywood's first explicitly anti-Nazi feature film, Confessions of a Nazi Spy, starring Edward G. Robinson. As well, the Warners were the first studio moguls to sever business relations with Hitler's Germany.

Under pressure from their father, the brothers worked together as a team. But the arrangement collapsed after Jack, in a stinking manoeuvre, took control and ousted his siblings. United they stood, divided they fell.

Kaspar Heidelbach's fine German-language feature film, Berlin '36, focuses on the trials and tribulations of Gretel Bergmann, a world-class German Jewish high jumper who was cynically exploited by the Nazis to forestall a U.S. boycott of the summer Olympic Games in Berlin. Bowing to an American demand that at least one Jewish athlete should be permitted to compete on Germany's team, Germany recruited Bergmann for its track and field squad. Yet Germany never had any intention of using her, having found an athlete – a man disguised as a woman – to displace her at the last possible moment.

Karoline Herfurth plays the Jewish high jumper Gretel Bergmann in Berlin '36.

Bergmann, an exile in Britain, had no desire to compete for Germany. But when the Nazis threatened her family in Germany, she had no choice but to join the German team at its training camp. Her first coach was a decent fellow, but his successor was a Nazi. Bergmann was treated like a pariah by the second coach and some of the athletes.

Berlin '36 portrays these events in competent style. Karoline Herfurth – a luminous poster child for Aryan womanhood – plays Bergmann with poise and dignity. Hans Waldmann depicts Axel Prahl, the first coach sacked by the Nazis, with gravitas and sensitivity.

In a riveting afterward, the real Bergmann appears on screen. She says she was "forced into my situation," adding that her life would have been endangered had she been allowed to compete, win a gold medal and disprove the Nazi racial canard that Jews are inferior.

Dirk Regel's feature film, Oh, What a Mess, is set in contemporary Germany and deals with such common-place issues as acculturation and mixed marriage. Who would have thought, 65 years after the Third Reich's ignominious defeat, that such issues would arise in Germany? But given the growth of Germany's resurrected Jewish community since the fall of communism, no one should really be surprised that a German film director has chosen this topic.

The film, a comedy, turns on Jil, a single, 20-something Jewish tax consultant who falls in love with Mark, a German evangelical Christian and landscape architect. Since her father is opposed to interfaith unions, Jil asks her boyfriend to pretend to be Jewish. He agrees and acquits himself quite well. But after Mark's cover is blown, all hell breaks loose, and he and Jil must decide whether they will continue to be a couple. Oh, What a Mess, though schmaltzy, manages to provide viewers with what may be an inside picture of modern Jewish life in Germany.

The Line King: The Al Hirschfeld Story, by Susan Warms Dryfoos, is a portrait of a famed caricaturist whose simple yet revealing drawings graced the pages of the New York Times' Sunday arts section for several decades and usually won him the admiration of his subjects.

Hirschfeld, raised in a Russian-Jewish immigrant household and influenced by Asian line drawings and the British caricaturist Max Beerbohm, forged his stellar reputation on Broadway. After attending a preview or a dress rehearsal of a play, he would repair to his studio, seat himself in an old barber's chair and finish the drawing.

With a single scribble of his pen, he could draw out character, personality and mood, producing seemingly effortless, lighter-than-air caricatures. "He made people interesting, not beautiful," says an observer.

Hirschfeld, though starting out as a sculptor and proficient in watercolours and oils, preferred line drawings to anything else. That was his forte.

This film, released about seven years before his death in 2003 at the ripe old age of 100, traces the arc of his illustrious career and his marriage to the German actor Dolly Haas, who was his muse for half a century.

The Loners, by Renen Schorr, unfolds mainly in an Israeli military prison. Two Soviet immigrants serving in the Israeli army, Sasha and Glori, have been accused of treason, charged with selling munitions and weapons to Hamas. The accusation is particularly shocking to Sasha, since he has just been accepted to officers' training school. Certain he will be brutalized as a traitor by his fellow inmates, Sasha asks for a retrial, but his request is ignored. In desperation, he and Glori, his friend, stage a revolt. Regrettably, The Loners is more monotonous than exciting.

Israel Ltd, directed by Mor Loushy, follows several North American teenagers as they partake in The Israel Experience, a month-long youth program. The teens get tours of former battlefields and a Druze village and are taken to a disco and the Western Wall. They are also given history and shooting lessons, and exposed to a moving story of a soldier who lost his limbs in battle. On their final day in Israel, they are urged to become ambassadors for the Jewish state.

The guides, in the main, present a militarized and rather skewed picture of Israel. The teens are alternatively bored and moved by their experiences.

Play explores sex, drugs, rock 'n' roll and the Holocaust

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Jake Ehrenreich always wanted to be a real American.

He excelled at stickball, played the drums, listened to Christmas music and spoke Yiddish – which is what always gave him away.

Ehrenreich, who wrote and performs in the one-man play A Jew Grows in Brooklyn, is the son of Holocaust survivors. Born in the United States, he spent years fighting his culture. Now, he's fighting to give it a voice.

"The story of Holocaust survivors has been told. I said, 'One day, I'm going to tell this story from my perspective,'" said Ehrenreich, who will be performing his play in Toronto at the Panasonic Theatre from April 28 to May 16.

"The story didn't end. These people had children."

Ehrenreich's play delves into his immigrant experience, which includes his father's Holocaust testimony, his sisters' and mother's battle with early onset Alzheimer's and his desperate need to fit in with American culture.

It's also a musical comedy.

"Judaism has a wonderful tradition of the circle of life. There's a time for mourning and a time to end mourning," he said. "When you get people to laugh, they become more emotionally attainable… when people laugh with you, they trust you."

When writing the play, Ehrenreich, a musician and actor in his early 50s, was careful to keep a balance between light and dark. He never laughed at anyone, he laughed with them.

"My great-aunt, she looked like Yoda. Did I love her? Of course," he said, adding that he'll never forget her response when asked her age for a medical form.

"She said, 'A woman can't tell her age.' I felt like saying, 'Your age? I can't tell your gender.' That's an important part of where the laughter comes from. It's laughing at ourselves."

For Ehrenreich, the jokes were the easy part.

"The most challenging parts were always the most personal," he said.

Jake Ehrenreich

This includes talking about his family's experience in the Holocaust.

"[My great-aunt] said, 'All you need to know is the best of us didn't survive.' [Survivors] lived with a tremendous amount of guilt," he said.

Along with comedy and multimedia displays, such as his father's Holocaust testimony, Ehrenreich tells his story through music, using both Yiddish and rock songs.

"Music to me is really a way I relate to the world," he said.

"I play instruments in the show… I'm so surprised how people relate to the drum solo. Drums are extremely elementary and people go crazy. The applause you get is different than everything else."

About a year and a half ago, Ehrenreich was asked by Health Communications Inc., the company that publishes the Chicken Soup for the Soul series, to turn his play into a book of the same name as the play.

"The book was the biggest surprise of my life. I thought it would be a snap, but it was an arduous undertaking," he said.

In the book, he discusses parts of his life that were left out of the play, including his extensive drug use, which caught up with him in his late 20s during a gig at the Red Parrot Nightclub in New York.

"I had done so much blow that my heart felt like it was exploding out of my chest, and I actually felt like I could die right then and there," he wrote.

Ehrenreich was also able to go into detail about what he calls his womanizing (he lost his virginity at 15) and the life lessons that he learned, like taking responsibility for his mistakes.

"I wanted to maintain that same balance of humour and life lessons," he said.

Ehrenreich attributes some of the play's success to the fact that his story is universal.

"It's a very traditional Jewish story, but I've been told that [I] can be speaking Korean," he said. "The journey we all share is one that deals with loss and fear and laughter and who we are. I wanted to be an American. It took me a long time to realize, 'Why can't I be both?'"

New perspective on Gershwin

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

The music of Broadway legend George Gershwin comes alive at the Winter Garden Theatre in Toronto when The Soul of Gershwin, the Musical Journey of An American Klezmer opens on May 1.

The theatrical concert was created and written by Joseph Vass, the show's musical director and pianist, and the guiding spirit behind American klezmer group Klezmerica. It features 23 songs by George Gershwin (1898-1937).

The Soul of Gershwin demonstrates how a generation of Jewish-American composers were influenced by the cross-pollinating sounds of the day, the ultimate expression of immigrant assimilation. They wrote for Broadway musical theatre, blending classical music techniques and forms with jazz techniques and the popular music of the day.

"Gershwin comes on stage and starts to tell the story of where his music comes from. There are a lot of Gershwin songs and a lot of other music intermingled as he goes forward. The music really tells its own story, Gershwin is setting it up," says Vass, the Springfield, Ill., native who now makes his home in Maplewood, Minn., with his wife, comedian Susan Vass.

Although Vass grew up Jewish, he wasn't very aware of Jewish music until his later years.

"As I began to understand Jewish music, it came to me that Gershwin was a kind of Jewish music. When I studied piano, I learned that Gershwin and a whole generation of American songwriters, who wrote the jazz standards – the 'American Songbook,' including Gershwin, Harold Arlen, Rogers and Hart, Kurt Weill, later when he moved from Germany, Irving Berlin and on and on – were Jews.

"So, I began to wonder if there was a connection between Jewish music and this music that I was told came from a combination of European and black music. It seemed to me, when I heard actual African-American music played by African-Americans, it didn't sound much like Gershwin or Berlin… There were missing ingredients."

When people ask Vass what Jewish music is, he says that we have been listening to Jewish music our whole lives and just didn't know it. He doesn't really believe there is such a thing as "klezmer music." Klezmer is rather a person, a vessel of song. Thus, Musical Journey of an American Klezmer makes sense. Gershwin is not playing a narrow, ethnic-defined instrumental music that some people label klezmer. But Jewish musicians are "klezmers," who often incorporate different things that they hear from different places.

He feels that after hearing Gershwin's music in the show, we will have a deeper understanding and a greater appreciation and experience. Vass promises the show is not klezmerized Gershwin tunes, but a celebration of the music of Gershwin and his generation and what Jewish music gave to the larger world of music.

The Soul of Gershwin is directed by Peter Moore and presented by the Harold Green Jewish Theatre Company, in association with the National Jewish Theatre. Michael Paul Levin plays Gershwin, and the show includes three vocalists, Bruce A. Henry, Prudence Johnson and Robert Marinoff, and an onstage band, Klezmerica. This contemporary six-piece music ensemble with Vass at the helm has performed throughout the United States and at Israel's International Klezmer Festival.

The show runs from May 1 to 9. For tickets, call 416-872-5555, or go to www.ticketmaster.ca. For more information on The Soul of Gershwin, go to www.thesoulofgershwin.com.

And now for something completely different: HEEBONICS

Band takes off in one fell swoop

Toronto band One Fell Swoop is made up of Dunniel Medina, left, Dean Medina, David Rakusin and Jason Pilarski.

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

It started with an African drum and a guitar. There were no speakers, no microphones, no expensive equipment, just two guys and their instruments playing on the streets of Amsterdam.

They had no idea that, a few years later, they'd be opening for Israeli musician David Broza and playing to crowds of hundreds.

"I got to Amsterdam and I kind of wanted to start on a completely clean slate," said Dean Medina, the co-founder of the Toronto band One Fell Swoop. Medina, who sings and plays guitar, used to hate performing in public.

"I would never want to play to people in my own household. Anytime people came in, I stopped playing. I was just shy to sing... I was afraid of criticism," he said. Everything changed during a trip to Amsterdam.

"I started messing around and playing for people. I figured I'll never see them again, if I perform in front of them and they don't like it, who cares? But people really enjoyed it," he said.

It didn't take long for percussionist Jason Pilarski, a friend of Medina's, to join him in Amsterdam with a jambi, a type of African drum.

"It was kind of scary at first. You're sitting in a foreign place, playing music just out of nowhere, not knowing what kind of reaction you're going to get. But it turned out to be amazing," Pilarski said.

It was in Amsterdam that the two musicians wrote one of their first song together, called Origins. Origins is also going to be the name of One Fell Swoop's first album, which they're hoping to finish by the end of May.

But there was never really supposed to be an album. There was barely supposed to be a band.

After performing in Amsterdam, Pilarski and Medina came back to Toronto and started playing at a few venues. It was a hobby, a good way to pass the time. Then Medina's older brother, Dunniel, 28, came to see a show.

"[Pilarski and Medina] played a few shows in Toronto. They had humble beginnings. They didn't have a plan at that point," said the elder Medina, who plays guitar and sings in the band. "I went to see them once to support my brother and I said, 'I think I can add to the band.'"

Before joining One Fell Swoop, Medina had been playing wherever he could, which included rooftops and beaches in Israel.

"I've been writing music for a long time. I wanted to [play with] like-minded people that want to create music and get a wider audience for it," said the older Medina. "As soon as you start thinking, 'I want to immortalize my music,' then you start thinking about promoting it... It moved from that fun hobby to where we want to play as much as we can."

The band's next step was to find a bassist, which is where David Rakusin came in. Rakusin, 24, knew some of the band members through school and was asked to join One Fell Swoop last July.

"I went to see their shows, and I really liked their music," said Rakusin. "We all get along really well. We have similar ideals about music. We all just really like performing together." After Rakusin joined, the band started to get serious, practising three times a week and performing anywhere they could.

Like most of the band members, Rakusin is shocked by One Fell Swoop's success.

"Some of the first shows we played, there were 20 or 30 people [in the audience.]... Our last one had 250 to 300 people," he said. "We just want to go out and perform and try to put out a fun show. If people are out watching and dancing... that's the best thing."

The band's popularity is linked to their catchy songs, which the older Medina describes as polished pop music. His brother, on the other hand, is hesitant to define their style.

"We all write completely different songs. There's a lot of pop, a lot of rock. A lot of the stuff I work on is reggae and ska," he said. "We don't stick to one genre, that's for sure."

One Fell Swoop, which recently opened for Israeli singer David Broza at Artzy, a Hillel-sponsored art showcase, is known for mixing upbeat melodies with serious lyrics.

"It's a curious mix of dark and light. The songs can be very serious and sombre in their lyrics and very upbeat in their melody and the other way around, too," said Medina's older brother. An example of this is the song From the Desert, which is about the Jewish experience and has references to the Holocaust.

"That song has an uplifting chorus, and it should, but the verse itself is very sombre," Medina said. "That's an interesting aspect of the music that many people really like."

The band first started gaining fans by playing charity shows, something that they've continued to do. Recently, they started the Swoop Movement, which is when they dedicate shows to various charities. They perform charity shows every few months at the El Mocambo in Toronto as part of their Swoop for Soup series, which supports local soup kitchens and other organizations in the city.

"That's pretty much 90 per cent of what we do. Charity is a great way to get your foot in the door" said the younger Medina. "It's a great thing as well. We have something to offer. People really enjoy the music."

One Fell Swoop will be performing at United We Rock: The Concert for Human Rights on May 8 at Dundas Square and will also be playing at a Swoop for Soup show at the El Mocambo on May 28. For more information, visit www.swoop-music.com.

The donkey, the monkey, the writer and the Holocaust

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

Is it possible to write a Holocaust novel without mentioning concentration camps, Jews and gas chambers?

Canadian author Yann Martel, whose award-winning novel Life of Pi sold more than seven million copies, seems to think so.

Yann Martel

"To my mind, Beatrice and Virgil is a Holocaust novel, but not a conventional one," Martel says of his new novel, which features a donkey and a howler monkey as two of its main characters. "I am trying to capture the Holocaust without all the history and conventions of a Holocaust novel.

"What got me started on this book was something that I noticed over years of reading Holocaust literature – that the mode of representation that dominates the Holocaust is non-fiction," Martel says. "If you ask your average person, 'When you think of the Holocaust, what writers do you think about?' Likely it would be Primo Levi, Elie Wiesel and Anne Frank. It struck me how little 'true fiction' there really is on the Holocaust – truly invented stories."

In Beatrice and Virgil (Knopf Canada), Henry is a successful novelist whose latest project is an allegorical Holocaust novel, which he wants to publish as a flipbook, combined with an essay he wrote on Holocaust literature. His publishers balk at the idea, so instead he puts it aside and moves with his pregnant wife to an unnamed European city.

There, he comes across an unusual elderly taxidermist, also named Henry, who requests Henry's help with a play he's writing about Beatrice, a donkey, and Virgil, a howler monkey. The play, we find out, takes place on the back of a blue and grey striped shirt and is revealed to us through the course of the novel in snippets. Bit by bit we learn that the animals are living through what they call The Horrors – an event that begins to remind Henry of the Holocaust.

Martel says that fictitious representations of the Holocaust are overdue. After all, he argues, war, which killed millions of people, has successfully been interpreted in many different ways.

"With the Holocaust we've been much more stringent with how we apply it," Martel, who is not Jewish, says. "It's not a criticism of what's out there, but don't we also need to have those representations that come to us through the imagination?"

He cites, for instance, Stephen Crane's The Red Badge of Courage, which is a Civil War classic even though the author was born after the war. "He used his imagination. The fact that he wasn't there didn't take away from his credibility because it works. And that's the benchmark: Does it work? Does it make sense? Does it move you?"

The play in this novel is mostly a philosophical dialogue between Beatrice and Virgil, a lot of which deals with finding ways to represent the horrific events happening to them.

"How are we going to talk about what happened to us one day when it's over?" Beatrice asks Virgil.

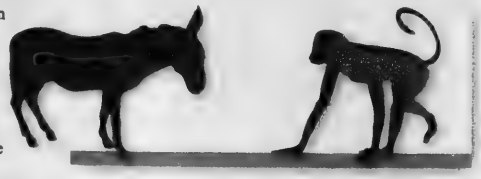
"That's assuming we survive," Virgil replies solemnly.

Martel says one of the reasons why there hasn't been a true fictitious account of the Holocaust is because of the sheer size of the atrocity. War is a lot easier to write fiction about because we can accept that soldiers die.

"In war, soldiers must die. The Holocaust is the genocide of civilians. A single murder is a boon to storytelling. Who killed him? How? We delight in that. But once you get too many victims it all blurs. The victims become depersonalized."

Stories operate with characters, he explains. In the case of the Holocaust, the characters were linked only through a single trait – being Jewish, a trait which meant different things to different people. "That was the only thing that linked all these personalities, that they were Jewish. And how do you tell a story where personality does not matter?"

The other problem he sees with telling a Holocaust story is that the narrative arc is always the same. "In the genocide, you are either a victim or a victimizer. You are trapped in this narrative arc which is great if you are the first to tell it."



He says the natural reaction when telling a genocide story is to be a witness and say what happened, like Levi and Wiesel. "There is nothing wrong with that, but to me history really stays with us and becomes meaningful if in some ways it becomes a story. Stories that are non-fictional are tied to history, and as time goes by their believability may diminish. We have to start telling the Holocaust in different ways. Once an event has past, you're only left with its representations. As ghastly as it sounds, we need to have Holocaust westerns and science fiction and comedies. Better a funny memorial than no memorial at all."

Martel says that without fiction the Holocaust will disappear someday. " I do think with time, it will start to fade. We haven't found a way of weaving it into the emotional text of our lives. It's too massive, too literal, too far away. And the event was so unbelievable. With that degree of personal hatred, you need devices to tell that tale."

Although in the book, Henry's wife refers to the play as "Winnie the Pooh meets The Holocaust," Beatrice and Virgil is not a children's fable. As the play gets revealed to us, it gets darker and darker and what starts as wonderfully-written dialogue about the taste and feel of a pear takes a horrific turn.

In one of many touching bits of dialogue between the two animals, Virgil, the monkey, wants to tell Beatrice three jokes; but Beatrice doesn't want to hear them. "I can't anymore," Beatrice tells Virgil. "Not laugh, or even try to laugh. About anything."

"Then those criminals have truly robbed us of everything," Virgil says.

"We always see the Holocaust as the very end, when people are walking to the gas chambers and that silences everything ," Martel says. "We've got to pull back and see they were human beings before that. Yes, people died but before they died they were alive. No one likes utterly sad things. If you lose your joy of life, your laughter, then the victimizers have robbed you of everything. They've won the day."

Comparisons to George Orwell are a certainty, and Beatrice and Virgil does to the Holocaust what Animal Farm did to the Russian Revolution.

"Animal Farm discusses Russia without discussing Russian history," Martel says. "It's proper allegory. Art gets to the essence of the event and ignores the facts which are too numerous and too weighty and creates other facts which are fictitious but are spiritually true. Animal Farm is spiritually true but fictitious nonsense. I'm trying to get to the same thing with Beatrice and Virgil, speak about the Holocaust without speaking about it literally – to get to its essence."

Nazi past haunts Austria's upcoming elections

By RUTH ELLEN GRUBER
JTA

ROME — Austrians will go to the polls April 25 to vote for a president after a volatile campaign that focused in part on right-wing extremism and raised the ghosts of Austria's Nazi past.

Incumbent President Heinz Fischer, a Social Democrat, is expected to win a landslide victory over his main rival, Barbara Rosenkranz, a regional leader of the far-right Freedom party (FPO), which was once led by the late Joerg Haider.

Two weeks ahead of the election, two public opinion polls showed Fischer, 71, with more than 80 per cent of voter support, compared to 12 to 14 per cent for Rosenkranz and four to six per cent for Rudolf Gehring of the small Austrian Christian Party. Re-election of the popular Fischer was such a foregone conclusion that the main conservative force, the Austrian People's Party, did not put up a candidate.

Rosenkranz, a 51-year-old mother of 10, entered the race in early March in a bid many experts saw as a test for the Freedom party's staunchly anti-immigrant, law-and-order, anti-European Union platform ahead of regional elections later this year.

The wife of a key longtime member of a now banned neo-Nazi party, Rosenkranz quickly sparked an outcry over ambiguous statements about the Holocaust and criticism of Austria's tough 1947 anti-Nazi law.

In response, Cardinal Christoph Schonborn, the Catholic archbishop of Vienna, said that "someone who questions the National Socialism prohibition law and fails to make clear statements regarding the Holocaust is not an option for me personally."

Members of Austria's 8,000-member Jewish community joined political, civic and social network groups in spearheading opposition to Rosenkranz's presidential bid.

A Jewish community statement called her candidacy an "embarrassment" for Austria and a "mockery of the 65,000 Austrian Jews killed in the Shoah."

Jewish community president Ariel Muzicant helped organize a candlelit anti-Rosenkranz rally on March 25, drawing thousands outside the Hofburg Palace, the seat of the Austrian presidency. The rally grew out of an anti-Rosenkranz Facebook group that had more than 91,000 members as of two weeks before the elections.

Nazi Germany annexed Austria in 1938, and many Austrians were willing supporters of the Nazi regime. But the victorious World War II Allies officially declared Austria "the first free country to fall victim to Hitlerite aggression."

It wasn't until the 1980s that the country began a close examination of its World War II history, when Kurt Waldheim was elected president in 1986 despite revelations of a Nazi past.

Following the public outcry over Rosenkranz's criticism of the Austrian law banning Holocaust denial, Nazi organizations and Nazi ideology as "an unnecessary restriction" on freedom of opinion, she signed a public declaration "disassociating" herself from Nazi ideology.

Critics, however, said her ambiguous views dated too far back to benefit from the apology. More than seven years ago, a journalist had already branded Rosenkranz a "closet Nazi."

"Rosenkranz is on the extreme right wing of an already extreme right party," said Hanno Loewy, the director of the Jewish Museum in the western Austria town of Hohenems.

Immigrants and Muslims, rather than Jews, are the main target of the Freedom party's rhetoric. About 500,000 Muslims live in Austria, and the party campaigns under slogans such as "The West is for Christians" and "Homeland instead of Islam."

Rosenkranz has called for the reintroduction of border controls with Austria's eastern neighbours, in order to stop the "import of crime."

Despite their omission, Jews feel targeted. In March, vandals defaced the Mauthausen concentration camp near Linz with anti-Jewish and anti-Turkish graffiti.

> Immigrants and Muslims, rather than Jews, are the main target of the Freedom party's rhetoric

"The progeny of Muslims are for us what the Jews were to our fathers. Be on your guard. Jews and Turks, poisonous blood," read the graffiti, spray-painted in big letters on the outer wall of the camp, where more than 100,000 people were killed.

"FPO leaders and functionaries keep getting caught in open or coded Holocaust denial, anti-Semitism and neo-Nazi affairs," said American historian Stan Nadel, an expert on migration who teaches in Salzburg. "They don't talk openly about Jewish conspiracies, just about 'East Coast' conspiracies."

Rosenkranz, he said, "doesn't say the Holocaust never happened. She just says she believes in the history she was taught in school – she went to school at a time when school history courses generally stopped with 1918," Nadel said. "Her anti-Semitic supporters know that, and they understand she is covertly denying the Holocaust, but she hasn't said it out loud, so she hasn't broken the law."

The Freedom party's outspoken leader, Heinz-Christian Strache, said his party's views were justified by a poll last week showing that 54 per cent of Austrians believe Islam poses "a threat for the West and our familiar lifestyle."

The survey, conducted by the IMAS polling agency, showed that 72 per cent believe Muslims would "not stick to the rules" when it comes to living in Austria and 71 per cent believe Islam "does not match western beliefs in democracy, freedom and tolerance."

Strache, 40, a former dental technician, is expected to make a run for the provincial leadership when key elections are held in Vienna in October. Analysts say the Social Democrats may lose their absolute majority in the capital, and they predict sharp gains for the Freedom party.

Erlich, Werek start summer early after teams eliminated

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

By any measure, Daniel Erlich had a pretty good OHL season: fourth in scoring (16 goals, 43 assists) on a second-place team; second in playoff scoring through two rounds; a three-point night in critical Game 6 of the second round, and more conscientious play in his own zone.

Not bad for a 19-year-old who stands 5-7 and weighs all of 165 pounds. But was it enough to get him noticed by NHL scouts prior to this year's entry draft after being ignored last year? Or, more to the point, is it enough to get some team, any team, to overlook the fact that NHL small man Martin St. Louis – at 180 pounds – is a power forward next to Erlich?

Following a disappointing conclusion to an otherwise pretty good season, Erlich was pretty upbeat. He feels he did what he could to help his team, the London Knights, advance through the OHL playoffs and he's confident he'll get a call from some team interested in a highly skilled, albeit smaller player.

His stats in the high-intensity crucible of playoff hockey should impress: nine goals and 12 assists in a dozen games, second only to highly touted Toronto Maple Leaf draft pick Nazem Kadri (27 points) in team and league scoring after two rounds.

Playing right wing next to Jared Knight and Michael MacDonald (with 36 and 25 goals, respectively), Erlich went from being a playmaker during the regular season to a sniper in the post season. "I just hit a hot streak. I started shooting the puck and it started to go in," he said.

Facing the Kitchener Rangers in the OHL Western Conference semifinals, the series was a see-saw affair that wasn't decided until the seventh game.

"It was just a really weird series," Erlich said. "It could have gone either way."

Unfortunately for London, Game 7 went the other way as Kitchener eliminated the Knights with an 8-3 win. London actually led 1-0 after one period but suffered an inexplicable collapse in the second, ending the frame down 5-1. Erlich still isn't sure what happened. "Lucky bounces went in" and players weren't concentrating. "It just happened," he said.

Daniel Erlich

Although the Knights didn't accomplish what they set out to do, Erlich felt "I had my biggest game in the OHL" in Game 6. He notched three assists in a 5-3 London win that forced a seventh game. What's more, "I thought I played well defensively," he said.

At the other end of the province, Ethan Werek and the Kingston Frontenacs also faced a premature end to their season, this time after only one playoff round. They were defeated by the Brampton Battalion, but despite the early exit, for Werek, the glass was half full. The Frontenacs, he pointed out, hadn't made the playoffs in years and the team under head coach Doug Gilmour "took a step in the right direction."

Despite a couple of injuries – the 19-year-old hurt his hip flexor early in the season and suffered a slight tear of his medial collateral knee ligament in the playoffs – "I had a pretty good year," Werek said.

In 57 games he scored 30 goals and added 34 assists, good for second in team scoring behind Nathan Moon.

A six-foot-two, 195-pound centre, Werek was drafted by the New York Rangers in the second round, 47th overall last year.

"I try to be an aggressive, hard-working player and create opportunities," Werek said, describing his style. Some say he resembles a younger Corey Perry.

Coincidentally, Werek and Erlich are good friends. Both are the children of Israeli parents and they grew up playing together, Werek said. Games against each other are more fun than the average OHL encounter, with jokes and barbs traded on the ice, followed by a get-together for dinner afterwards.

Playing under Gilmour has been a treat, Werek added. "He's a real player's coach. He knows what it is to be a player, he pushes us hard in practice and he treats us as professionals."

In his second year in the league, Werek said he began to feel more comfortable and he saw his performance improve, despite missing games due to injury. Living with Jay and Toby Abramsky helped, as the Kingston couple included him in celebrating Jewish holidays and taking him to synagogue.

Werek and Erlich both expect they'll be back in the OHL next season, though both are also getting ready to attend pro training camps in the fall – Werek with the Rangers and Erlich with – well, who knows?

Last season, though undrafted, he was invited to the San Jose Sharks' camp and loved it. "It was a great experience," he said. "I did well and got positive feedback."

After a short rest, both guys say they'll resume training to achieve what the NHL wants: to get faster, bigger and better.

Werek, who played for Canada's Under-18 junior team, has his heart set on playing in the world Junior tournament and later in the NHL.

Ethan Werek

Erlich is likewise determined to make hockey his career. If it doesn't pan out in North America, he'll look to Europe. He's got the bug. Whether it's here or overseas, all he knows is that he'll be playing hockey somewhere.

Important to have the conversation

By MICHAEL GORDON

The Senior Side of Life

The daughter was in turmoil. She called me about her mother, who was suffering from late-stage dementia. She and her two brothers could not agree on whether to put in a feeding tube, as it was becoming impossible to provide adequate nutrition. There had already been two episodes of aspiration pneumonia.

"My two brothers and I are in complete disagreement and I don't know what to do. I can't accept that we can let her die like that."

I asked her what she thought her mother would want under the circumstance.

"We never talked about such things. My brothers and I tried to bring up the topic and she told us it was not something she wanted to discuss. She was a very proud woman and always had a positive view of the world. Talk of illness and dying was just too morbid for her."

I asked: "In the absence of actual discussions, what do you think she would want, knowing what kind of person she was?"

The daughter replied: "She was a tenacious person and always a fighter."

I outlined some of the considerations she should bring to her and her siblings' decision-making process that might reflect their feelings about what mattered to her mother, and then left it for the daughter to discuss them with her siblings.

This discussion occurred a few days after a series of meetings I attended where some of the challenges in long-term care planning by elders with their children was one of the topics of the program. Over and over, those involved in one of the roundtable discussions where various eldercare specialists and planners were gathered came back to the concept of "having the conversation."

We all agreed that there was often an enormous reluctance for loved ones to broach the subject of future planning for living arrangements, financial planning preferences or wishes for end-of-life or serious life-imperilling situations. The question that kept coming up was why there was such a reluctance to explore one's wishes and values when late-stage illness such as dementia or malignant disease might occur.

Many reasons were given by those around the table, including superstition, discomfort in facing negative aspects of life, religious beliefs or one's personality and relationship with those with whom the discussion would have to be held for it to be meaningful.

Some years ago, there was large-scale impetus for people to develop living wills as a way of assuring their wishes would be honoured should they no longer be able to make health-care decisions. For some, the process proved useful. For others, it became too complicated or threatening.

From various studies, many eldercare specialists concluded that the written document was not the most important part of the process. Rather it was the conversation that explored wishes and personal values that could form the basis of decisions that reflected what the person was likely to do if he or she could assist in the process.

The daughter called back a few weeks later and told me that she and her siblings had decided against the feeding tube and would allow their mother to receive supportive and palliative care with comfort measures only for her last weeks of life.

"I wish we'd had the conversation," she said. "But I believe this is what our mother would have wanted."

Try to have that important conversation with your loved ones so that decisions can be made during the last period of your life that reflect your wishes and values.

Dietary tips for diabetics

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Do you have diabetes but you are not sure what you should be eating?

You are not alone! Many people with diabetes have received limited education on managing their disease, and the tips below may help.

First, what is diabetes?

When we eat, most food turns into glucose (sugar), which causes blood sugar levels to rise. In a non-diabetic the pancreas gland and a hormone called insulin then kick in and reduce sugar levels back to normal. In a diabetic, not enough insulin is produced and the sugar levels remain high. This can cause serious health problems.

The most important nutrition components in controlling diabetes are eating regular, balanced meals and controlling weight.

The first recommendation is to not go long periods of time without eating – three meals and two snacks are ideal. In addition, you should limit sugar intake from foods and drinks. Have mixed meals consisting of lean protein, high-fibre carbs and vegetables. Fruits contain sugar and should therefore be limited to three per day and eaten with a mixed meal.

Maintaining a healthy weight is also essential, because having diabetes significantly raises your risk of heart disease. So be active and aim for a trim midsection. The ideal waist circumference for men is less than 40 inches, and for women less than 35 inches, since increased weight around the middle also increases risk for heart disease.

Finally, make sure to follow your doctor's orders, take all medications as prescribed and ensure that you understand your dietary requirements.

If you want more information, contact The Canadian Diabetes Association at www.diabetes.ca.

Turning 50 and no burial plot

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

I will be half a century old on April 27. 50! Am I my grandfather?

Being 47 didn't take much getting used to, and 48 walked in as if on a breeze. There was nothing terribly memorable about the onset of these ages. They were nondescript really, just like 34 or 28, and I thought little of them. "Hello," I wished them, and they answered the same.

Fifty, however, is belting out a noise loud enough to make me cringe, cover my ears and settle myself over the sink ready to vomit. My grandfather was 50, and then 60 and then 70. He always seemed older. Forever a senior. Me too?

Fifty is the jubilee year – seven times seven, plus 365 days – when, according to the Torah, the land must remain fallow and all debts are forgiven. Why do these things happen at 50? Because 50 is old and nobody holds debts for that long. So it's really not a problem, and it makes the borrower feel good – sort of.

At 49, I began accepting the fact that the face looking back at me in the mirror was that of a man about to enter into the youth of age. I looked closely for wrinkles and white hairs. I found them. Crow's feet. Creases. Folds. Rumples. They were all beginning to emerge. Where had my baby's bum gone?

Fifty. They call me sir at the car rental place, and some, knowing my almost half-century status, ask where I was when John F. Kennedy was assassinated. I tell them probably having my diapers changed.

I'm almost 50, and therefore have friendships that go back 40 years. I've known David since we were eight, so that's 42 years. Remember when someone said, 'Oh yeah, we've been playing mah-jong for 42 years,' and you'd think Baycrest? Me too.

I'm about to turn 50 years old, and that means my childhood is over, my early adulthood is complete, and any thoughts I had about being terribly attractive to younger woman are gone. I'm almost 50, and I remember dial phones, the milkman, Turkish delight, one sink, slow motion replay and Sweet Daddy Siki.

I've watched as men I know turned 50 and it was seldom pretty. Some of them pretended to be hunched over. Their hands were slightly creased. Others complained a lot. A few frequently reminded me they were almost as old as their father when he passed away – even if they were not. Chronic this and irritable that just kept on plaguing these poor fiends. And they were proud of their Air Miles.

It says in Pirkei Avot (Ethics of our Fathers 5:25) that 50 is the age when a man or woman can give advice. We are the "man" – the CEOs, prime ministers, school principals, senior rabbis, vice-presidents of sales and have lots of insurance. People are coming to us asking for advice about careers, investments, retirement places, books to read and memories of the war. What war? Any war.

They do this because we're 50 and that number sounds like history. We're junior sages, assistant wise folks but really have no idea what's going on.

I am just about to turn 50, and I am a bit shaky, feeling unbalanced and want so badly for God to say, "I'm kidding." But He's not. I am about to become that age when younger and older people will say, "Do you have a will? Where is your plot?"

My plot? Where is my plot? I don't know. What plot? Oh God, please help me. I'm not Mr. Rosensweig. Really.

Solemn ceremony, solemn promise

Members of the Israel Defence Forces took part Sunday in ceremonies at Yad Vashem marking Yom Hashoah v'Hagvurah. Chief of Staff Gabi Ashkenazi, photo on right, said that "the Jewish people will never again be dependent on the benevolence of others," for their defence. "Never again will Jewish children be fearful or begging for mercy. Never again will an advocate of evil be able to dictate the future of the Jewish people." Please see related story on page 37.

Iran says it's improving centrifuges

By BARAK RAVID
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Iran announced last Friday it had developed faster centrifuges for uranium enrichment, signalling determination to press on with its nuclear work despite possible new UN sanctions sought by U.S. President Barack Obama.

Obama acknowledged that sanctions would not necessarily shift Iran's behaviour, but said sustained world pressure could eventually prompt it to revise its nuclear calculations.

The centrifuges Iran is using now are adapted from a 1970s design and have been prone to breakdowns. Tehran is known to have been testing various new models for years.

It was not immediately clear when the new machines would be introduced into full-scale enrichment, something analysts say would be a significant step.

Western powers are seeking the support of Russia and China for a fourth round of UN sanctions against Tehran.

Obama, who hosts a nuclear security summit this week, wants Russia and China to support further measures to deter Iran from pursuing what the West believes is a covert drive to develop nuclear weapons. Tehran says its program has only peaceful purposes.

'Shoah' Soap Tested

MONTREAL — A bar of soap that its owner says was made from Jewish Holocaust victims was seized by police for tests. Montreal police took possession of the soap from Jewish shop owner Abraham Botines after he tried to sell the alleged World War II relic from his curiosity shop on the city's trendy St. Laurent Boulevard. Police will conduct a chemical analysis of the soap, which has a swastika stamped on it, the Montreal Gazette reported. Botines was willing to sell the bar for $300. He claims he bought it from a retired Canadian soldier who found it in a concentration camp. Botines said he tried to sell the item to a Shoah museum, which refused the offer, the paper reported.

Punk Impresario Dies

LONDON — Malcolm McLaren, the Jewish punk impresario who formed the Sex Pistols, died April 1 at a Swiss hospital of mesothelioma, a cancer. He was 64. He was raised by his maternal grandmother, Rose Isaacs, a member of London's venerable Sephardi community. In the early 1970s, he and his then-partner, Vivienne Westwood, ran a clothing store and were part of London's bleak, nihilistic arts scene. In 1975, he brought together the Sex Pistols, a group that eschewed pop music forms and function. Its songs and albums – including God Save the Queen, which savaged the monarch as a fascist – were banned. The band broke up in 1978, and its members and McLaren spent 10 years mired in lawsuits over who owned the music and name.

Protest Pre-planned

IRVINE, Calif. — The Muslim Student Union (MSU) at the University of California, Irvine, orchestrated the disruption of a Feb. 8 speech by Israel's U.S. ambassador, Michael Oren, leaked e-mails indicate. MSU representatives have said the disruption, which provoked an ongoing academic disciplinary process, had been the impetus of students acting individually. Eleven students were arrested for disrupting Oren's speech. The revelation about the e-mails was published by the Washington-based Investigative Project on Terrorism. It said the e-mails show the MSU both organized the disruptions and told students to say they acted on their own.

Israel Backs Gay Fest

SAN FRANCISCO — The Israeli consulate in San Francisco is co-sponsoring a month of events highlighting gay and lesbian culture, along with local Jewish groups. It's the first time a foreign country has sponsored such an event in the United States, the consulate told the San Francisco Chronicle. Until the end of April, Israeli films, concerts, dance performances, panel talks and author appearances will focus on gay culture in Israel and the U.S. Jewish community. Highlights include a screening of Yossi and Jagger, a 2002 Israeli film about a romance between two male IDF soldiers, and readings by Israeli novelist Yossi Avni-Levy, whose book, Auntie Farhuma Wasn't a Whore After All, features a gay couple.

Hungarian Jews Protest Anti-Semitism

BUDAPEST — More than 1,000 Jews marched through Budapest's Old Ghetto district April 6 in response to a series of anti-Semitic incidents in the lead-up to Hungary's elections this month.

The marchers defied a police recommendation to keep a low profile, marching in the neighbourhood of the Great Dohány Street Synagogue wearing kippot. The recommendation came the previous week, after the windows of a rabbi were stoned in the same area during a Passover seder.

The previous week, anti-Semitic graffiti appeared in various places in Budapest, a Holocaust memorial was damaged in the western Hungarian city of Zalaegerszeg and neo-Nazis held an anti-Semitic rally in the eastern city of Tiszaeszlár, where a notorious blood libel against the local Jewish community led to pogroms in 1882-83.

Organized by the Free Folks for Hungary movement and the Association of Hungarian Jewish Religious Communities, the Budapest demonstration was secured by the police and no violence was reported.

Jews have expressed concern about anti-Semitic overtones in the national election campaign. In a vote set for April 11, with a possible runoff on April 25, the ruling party Socialist party was expected to be toppled by the country's main conservative party. A far-right party is also expected to score significant gains. Hungary's estimated 50,000 Jews traditionally vote centre-left.

Carleton students attacked with machete

Pro-Israel advocates escape anti-Semitic incident

By CARA STERN
Special to The CJN

OTTAWA — Just one month after Israeli Apartheid Week, two Zionist students at Carleton University said they barely managed to escape after being physically attacked April 5 by a group of men, one of whom chased them with a machete.

Bernie Farber, CEO of Canadian Jewish Congress, calls this the most serious allegation in the Ottawa area in the past 15 years.

Both students are pro-Israel advocates and are well known on Carleton's campus.

Nick Bergamini, one of the victims, is the vice-president of student issues for the Carleton University Students' Association. He's not Jewish, but has shown continuous support for Israel.

He was with his Jewish roommate, Mark Klibanov, who is an executive on the Israel Awareness Committee of Ottawa, when they were attacked, he said.

Around 1:45 a.m. on April 5, the pair were on their way home from a bar in Hull, Que., when they heard "the shout of 'Zionist' in Arabic," Bergamini wrote in a recount of the events posted on his Facebook account.

Although Bergamini said they didn't know whether the shouts were directed at him or Klibanov, they both responded that they were, indeed, Zionists.

A group of 10 to 15 men surrounded them, shouting in Arabic, Bergamini wrote, and he was hit in the back of his head.

The pair then ran back to the bar, where he said they waited with the bouncers for about 10 minutes, until they deemed it safe to leave.

They were walking to the bridge back to Ottawa when a car pulled up to them with its occupants yelling anti-Semitic slurs, he recounted.

One of them opened the trunk and pulled out a machete, Bergamini said, and proceeded to chase them. He said witnesses told him the blade came within inches of his neck.

They managed to run away and found a nearby police car, he said. The students have since filed a report with police.

Bergamini said he recognized some of the attackers as fellow Carleton students.

Farber is urging the police to launch a full investigation, while B'nai Brith Canada is calling for universities to ban anti-Israel agitation, saying it has long warned about the "spill-over effects of anti-Israel hate-fests" such as Israeli Apartheid Week.

Bernie Farber calls incident most serious allegation in Ottawa area in past 15 years.

Noah Kochman, political affairs chair for the Canadian Federation of Jewish Students, said that calling Israel an apartheid state is discriminatory, demonizes Jewish students and doesn't support a peaceful solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

He said he would rather support a Palestinian Human Rights Week, adding that the federation would co-sponsor events if this were the focus.

Discussions on human rights and peaceful solutions to the conflict would be much more beneficial, he said.

Through the generations
...a sacred trust

Together, we can keep the HST away from your bottom line.

When the Harmonized Sales Tax (HST) is introduced in the new year, funeral expenses will be taxed for the first time in provincial history. Overnight, the cost of a funeral will jump by 8% resulting in an additional $800-$1,200 in expenses.

Prearranging funerals has always made good sense. Peace of mind, the ability to plan just how you want to be remembered, and freezing the cost in today's dollars are a few of the treasured benefits. Now there's one more reason to prearrange: significant tax savings.

The HST deadline is fast approaching. By acting now, you can keep that legacy for your loved ones.

Call Benjamin's Lifecycle Financial today to beat the tax and lock in the savings for your future.

Tell and retell the truth

Toward the end of the movie Exodus, there is a powerful scene in which the older children in the children's village on the fictionalized Kibbutz Gan Dafna carry to safety through the dark and treacherous steps of night the younger children of the kibbutz.

The war for Israel's independence has begun.

The children's trek is extremely dangerous because they must find their way through the lines of marauding, irregular armies of Arab mercenaries recruited by outside overlords to stanch at birth the nascent Jewish state.

It is also arduous because the children carry their precious cargo of very young ones on their backs through the rock-strewn gullies and pathways between the sloped hilltops of the Galilee. The young ones have been sedated to ensure their silence through the night

We subsequently are told that all the children, carried and carriers, arrived safely to their destination, which was merely the next Jewish community (or "settlement" to use the loaded language more familiar to contemporary ears) over the hill, where they were out of harm's way, at least temporarily.

For those who do not know, Exodus was the dramatic film version directed by the award-winning Otto Preminger and starring the late Paul Newman of the book by the same name written by Leon Uris. It tells the gripping story, through the lives of a number of men and women, of the birth of the State of Israel.

It is doubtful whether such a film would be made today. It is doubtful whether such a book would be written today. The propriety of the Jewish people returning to, building, let alone deserving a sovereign state of their own in the historic land of their ancestors, is no longer thought to be a politely correct view in many circles. A large part of the world has accepted the Arab world's assiduously, cynically, callously but, alas, successfully cultivated portrayal of the Palestinians as victims of the rapacious, colonialist, trespassing, thieving Jews. But that portrayal, it must be repeated as long as there is breath to do so, is abjectly and totally false.

From the editor's desk...

The evacuation of the children during Israel's War of Independence, however, as depicted in Exodus, it must also be told and retold, did actually happen. It happened, for example, at Kibbutz Gesher, some 12 kilometres south of the Sea of Galilee, where the Jordan and Yarmuk Rivers meet, and which The CJN recently visited.

The topography of the area immediately surrounding the kibbutz has determined the geo-politics of the area for generations and centuries. The gap between the Golan Mountains and the Hills of Gilead was one of the key "pathways" travelled by rumbling armies crossing from Asia to Europe, or Europe to Africa. Today, it is the meeting place of three countries: Jordan, Syria and Israel.

In May 1948, it was the intended point of entry into the newly declared State of Israel by the army of Iraq, one of the seven Arab states that attacked the Jewish state after May 15, 1948. The fighters from Kibbutz Gesher repulsed the Iraqis.

Gesher means bridge in Hebrew. The kibbutz takes its name from the span across the Jordan River, a functional concrete and steel remnant of which still exists. The other bridges that once joined the two sides of the small rivers in the area were bombed by the Israeli forces in the War of Independence to prevent the Iraqi forces from penetrating Israel near the kibbutz. The Iraqis ultimately did enter Israel at a point farther to the south, across the Jezreel Valley. But Gesher held.

In Genesis 1948: The First Arab-Israeli War (Signet Classics, 1972) journalist-historian, Dan Kurzman, described Gesher's heroic stand against the Iraqis.

"Iraq, having no common border with Israel, sent a brigade of about 3,000 men and an armoured car regiment... to the east bank of the Jordan River opposite the Israeli settlement of Gesher. The Iraqi plan was to ford the river, overrun Gesher and drive southwestward toward the sea, cutting Israel in two at her narrowest waist.

"Over hastily laid pontoon bridges replacing spans blown up by the Jews, Iraqi forces, on May 16, struck across the Jordan and, after intense fighting managed to seal off Gesher. Iraqi soldiers in armoured cars then assaulted the front gate of the neighbouring police fortress, blew it up, and were about to enter the building itself when a defender hurled a Molotov cocktail at the leading armoured car which had penetrated the courtyard. The vehicle burst into flames and the attackers fled. Discouraged by their failure, the Iraqis satisfied themselves thereafter with keeping Gesher under tight siege."

There is a small museum on the site that tells of the heroic fighting during the War of Independence and of the hydro-electric power station built in 1932 by the visionary, risk-taking engineer Pinchas Rutenberg that sits today unused merely metres from the bridge across the Jordan.

Our guide and teacher from the kibbutz, Nirit Bagron recounted for us, with pride, passion and a sense of hallowed possession, the story of Gesher, of the children and adults who carried the younger children to safety during war and of the men and women who staved off the Iraqi invaders.

The story is part of the history of our age. It demands to be recalled, told and retold. It denies the distortions that Israel's enemies propagate as truth. More importantly, it attests to the more rightful truth that the Jews are not interlopers in the land of our ancestors.

Toronto school board to review book

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The Toronto District School Board (TDSB) will launch a formal investigation into a controversial library book critics say is one-sided and portrays Israel in a hostile light.

The review was ordered after the TDSB received a formal written complaint from Brian Henry, who has a child in the Toronto school system and who has been highly critical of the book's one-sided and biased depiction of Israelis.

"We will now undertake the process of a formal review," said TDSB's Lloyd McKell, executive officer for student and community equity. "Before, we informally looked at the book. Staff gave their best professional judgement based on the educational and social value of the book."

The text in question, The Shepherd's Granddaugther, is part of the Ontario Library Association (OLA) Red Maple Program, designed to provide supplementary reading material to students in grades 6 through 8.

Prior to receiving the complaint, TDSB staff informally reviewed the book after parents, teachers and trustees voiced concerns about its negative depiction of Israelis. Responding to similar concerns last month, the York Region School Board issue a caution to teacher librarians to provide some context to the book's narrative, to ensure an "equitable learning environment free from bias and discrimination."

Last week, prior to receiving the complaint, the TDSB issued a similar directive to principals and teacher librarians after determining "readers are capable of deriving positive educational and social value from this book without developing destructive attitudes towards people in the current Middle East conflict."

The TDSB's memorandum stated, "It is important that teachers continue to provide appropriate guidance to students when they read this novel and other similar materials that contain controversial and sensitive issues."

The advisory encouraged teachers to have students identify the nature of bias and how it is developed; to be alert to biases and explore why they exist, and determine whether they are positive or negative and ascertain how to respond to bias in the text.

School trustee James Pasternak said he was disappointed the TDSB is retaining the book as part of the after-school reading program. "This book does not help bring people together or understand what the conflict in the Middle East is all about. It is totally out of context. It brings people apart and hardens their views," he said.

"I've read the book. It's clearly a situation in which the author has an axe to grind. It demonizes Israelis. It doesn't mention all the good things Palestinians and Israelis have done together – how thousands of Palestinians have been saved in Israeli hospitals, how 1.5 million Palestinians are Israeli citizens, that tens of thousands of Palestinians and Israelis work together."

Pasternak said that while the book is marketed as a work of fiction, "to a casual reader it's not presented in that way." He noted the cover contains a photograph of a real person and a testimonial to the "truth" it contains.

Pasternak said he and other trustees, including Sheila Ward, who has been a vocal critic of the book, "will see if we can send a signal to the OLA that the book is divisive.

"We can't stop them from endorsing certain books, but we can send a signal that we can have a second tier of review" to prevent students being exposed to books that advocate a political agenda, which would be contrary to the Education Act, he said.

Avi Benlolo, CEO of Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Center, said The Shepherd's Granddaughter should be accompanied by additional perspectives to give the book some balance. He said the centre doesn't favour censoring the book, but said it should be accompanied by resources to provide students with a broader context and perspectives.

He suggested a book, My Brother Was, would be a useful additional educational tool to accompany The Shepherd's Granddaughter. "It is a book about children who tell stories about siblings and family members and how they were affected by suicide bombers.

"That's the flip side regarding what Israel has to deal with and why there are restrictions and roadblocks that Palestinians have to deal with," he said.

In Barrie, meanwhile, businessman Robert Zober received a call from a teacher/librarian in the Simcoe Country District School Board who asked him to provide context and a different perspective about the issues raised in The Shepherd's Granddaughter.

Active in the Jewish community, he'd gotten to know the teacher a year before when he was asked to address about 70 kids in grades 7 and 8 about Operation Cast Lead, the Israeli military response to rocket attacks from Gaza that had attracted widespread criticism.

This time, Zober and his wife, Debbie, addressed a group of youngsters in grades 7 and 8 who were studying The Shepherd's Granddaughter in class. He also learned that the film, Occupation 101, which is highly critical of the Israeli presence in the West Bank, had also been shown to kids in grades 6 through 8.

Zober said "we tried to refute the book moderately, and we did that by showing what life in Israel is all about, its achievements in agriculture, information technology, medical innovations, as being part of the world and benefiting humanity," he said.

They also discussed Israel's geography and why the country is so important to Jews.

He found "there was a lack of understanding of the whole Middle East."

The youngsters' questions suggested they had a significant misconception and some were very shocked to hear our answers and responses. "From my reading of the book, without check, it will leave a very negative impression in the minds of those children. They will view Israel in a poor light," he said.

Celebrate this wondrous occasion

Some time after sundown arrives on April 18 separating the end of Yom Hazikaron (Remembrance Day for the fallen soldiers of Israel) from the start of Yom Ha'atzmaut (Israel's Independence Day) we should dedicate at least a few moments to reflect upon and celebrate that very special transition. For it is and will always be, truly, a wondrous occasion.

Sixty-two years ago, on the fifth day of Iyar, at a hastily arranged, deeply emotional gathering of many – but not all – of the "founding fathers" (and mothers), the declaration proclaiming the establishment of the Jewish State of Israel was read into the airwaves of history for all eternal time by the head of newly proclaimed provisional government, David Ben-Gurion.

In an earnest, firm, steady voice, he asserted the right of the Jewish people, after two millennia of exile, to be independent, free and sovereign in our own land.

"In the Land of Israel, the Jewish people came into being," he began. "In this land was shaped their spiritual, religious and national character. Here they lived in sovereign independence. Here they created a culture of national universal import and gave to the world the eternal Book of Books."

Some 20 paragraphs later, the prophetic, feisty, visionary leader of the Yishuv completed the reading of the declaration. The gathering quickly concluded. Everyone there rushed out of the historic chamber in the home of the former first mayor of Tel Aviv, Meir Dizengoff, to greet the Sabbath and to steel their nerves and their resolve for the attacks by the invading armies of seven Arab nations.

As he thought about the existential enormity of the impending declaration of the Jewish state, then underground leader and one of the country's future prime ministers, Menachem Begin, wrote: "There is no doubt that the revival of Hebrew national independence in our generation has no precedence in human history. A nation had been driven out of its country after the loss of its liberty… It had wandered about the face of the earth for nearly 2,000 years… And now, in the 71st generation of its exile, this wandering people had returned to its Homeland."

Some 22 years after he read the proclamation of the state, Ben-Gurion wrote: "You cannot reach for the higher virtue without being an idealist. The Jews are chronic idealists, which makes me humbly glad to belong to this people and to have shared in their noble epic [of establishing the sovereign State of Israel].

It was, as Begin wrote elsewhere, "a profoundly wondrous event," and in the words of Ben-Gurion, an act of the highest virtue in furtherance of the millennial reach of the Jewish people toward the ever illuminated star of morality, justice and ideals.

As we set our hearts and minds upon celebration next week, we should also thank God for bringing us to this very wondrous day.

Chag samayach.

Hoffman, 40, was a past president of the men's club at his Houston-area shul, Congregation Shaar Hasholom.

Israel's legal rights to the land

I must take strong exception to the sentiment expressed in the headline of the April 1st Editor's Desk, "U.S. harms peace hopes." What peace? What hopes? The time is long overdue to stop the sham of a "peace process" that has led nowhere for the past 17 years and replace it once and for all with confirmation of Israel's legal rights to the land.

On April 24 and 25, a worldwide commemoration will be held in San Remo, Italy, of the 90th anniversary of the San Remo Conference, where the Supreme Council of the Allies recognized and codified in international law Israel's legal rights to the land – and which remains valid to this day. (See related story on page 36.)

The notion of "illegally occupied" territories is invalid because these territories, in fact, had not been under the legal sovereignty of any nation when they were liberated by Israel in 1967. International law professor Talia Einhorn has said: "According to international law, Israel has full right to populate the entire Land of Israel with dense Jewish settlements and thus actualize the principles set by the League of Nations in the original Mandate Charter of San Remo in 1920."

In treating Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu so shabbily last month in Washington, D.C., U.S. President Barack Obama inadvertently presented Netanyahu with a golden opportunity to don the mantle of Churchillian statesmanship, ascend the stage of 21st-century world politics, and declare to the nations of the world that there exists a document legally binding on the international community, giving title to the Land of Israel back to the Jews. And we intend to hold them to it!

Unfortunate analogy

In his latest column, Rabbi Dow Marmur warns us that Israel may "become a kind of Jewish version of a Taliban state in which the haredim dominate" ("It's hard to be a Reform Zionist," April 1). Behind this unfortunate choice of analogy is his concern for the future status of those who converted to Judaism outside Israel.

Judaism is not a proselytizing religion. However, throughout its history, some individuals have been willing to undergo the thorough preparation required to convert. Among the 40 representatives of the 40 generations who passed along the Oral Law from Moses until it was written down in the Babylonian Talmud, there were some "righteous converts."

That's why all Jews, regardless of their position on the religious spectrum, should be troubled by the dilution of their ranks brought about by quickie conversions to get married or to immigrate to Israel. Becoming a Jew is more than just learning about a few ideas and festivities. It is a life-changing decision that requires rigorous, but fair, training.

Incorrect claims about rice on Pesach

Rabbi Yehiel Ben Ayon makes two claims, both of which are baseless, in his column "Not all Sephardim eat rice on Pesach" (April 1).

1) He claims: "For North African Sephardim, rice is a definite no-go area." This is incorrect. My father, who is from Tunis, ate rice, fava beans and lamb, as the seder meal, as did 95 per cent of Tunisian Jews. An Egyptian friend of mine eats rice on Pesach as well, as per his family tradition. Last I checked, both Tunisia and Egypt were part of Africa. To the best of my knowledge, only Moroccan Jews among Sephardim don't eat rice on Pesach.

2) "North African rabbis never banned rice," and the aversion to rice "began quite logically." Again, this is incorrect. Even Jews from Morocco ate rice until one of their sages discovered a wheat kernel mixed into his rice on Pesach. After that, he urged all his followers to refrain from eating rice on Pesach, which is why Moroccan Jews don't eat rice while most other Sephardim do.

IAW is an intifadah against truth

To say that this year's Israeli Apartheid Week (IAW) was "milder this year" is to admit that our own threshold of acceptance has been lowered to accommodate hate against Israel ("IAW fizzles on Canadian campuses," March 18). I was afraid that this might happen as the IAW campaign grows more professional, has access to unlimited funding domestically and from overseas and has become very slick in its presentation. However, we must never stop fighting IAW, which is an intifadah against truth.

Surprises in the CJCCC archives

By NAOMI CARUSO

It sometimes happens that certain gifts given to archives end up lying in dark corners unattended for years. The reasons vary – there is a shortage of staff, there is more pressing work, the collection requires a language other than the official English and French – but eventually it all gets done.

This is what happened to a gift from the Oberman family, a collection that came to the Canadian Jewish Congress Charities Committee National Archives (CJCCC) prior to 1988.

The collection was placed in three boxes, a short description was entered into the database, and since it turned out to be mostly in Hebrew, it was not looked at more closely.

A language expert was finally found, and earlier this year, the Oberman collection got the treatment it deserved. It turned out to contain quite a few surprises.

Since Yehudit and Morris Oberman were known as fervent Zionists who dedicated their life to working on behalf of Israel, it was assumed that the collection contained documentation pertaining to that. But upon closer scrutiny, the collection was found to contain much more.

The first surprise was discovering that Yehudit Oberman née Braslavsky (1901-2000), came from a very unusual family. Her father, mother and five children, emigrated from Ukraine to the Holy Land in 1905, when Yehudit was four years old. The family settled first in Ramla, a then-Arab village halfway between Jaffa and Jerusalem, where the father ran an inn for about two years. They then moved to Jaffa to allow the children to go to proper schools.

Tragically, within four years of their arrival in Jaffa, the father, aged 42, died, leaving his widow in dire straits as the sole provider of the family. How this brave woman managed under the miserable conditions of the early days of Jewish settlement, during the corrupt regime of the Ottoman Empire, belongs to a separate account. Suffice it to say that she did, and her five children grew and thrived. Of her three daughters, however, two ended up leaving what was then Palestine. Yehudit married Morris Oberman and came to Montreal. Her sister Miriam went to Paris. The three remaining siblings stayed on for the rest of their lives.

The second surprise was two-pronged.

First, was the realization that one of Yehudit's brothers was none other than Yosef Braslavi (1896-1972), the pioneer geographer of the Land of Israel who wrote the first guidebook to the country after walking its length and breath. His six-volume work, Hayadata et Ha' aretz? (Do you know the country?), is still in print today, as are many other books, articles and pamphlets on the same subject.

(Her other brother, Moshe (1902-1961), was also a writer who wrote extensively on the labour movement in Israel.)

Secondly, there were more than 500 letters written in Hebrew by Yosef Braslavi to his sister, spanning 50 years and covering all the main events of world and Jewish history of the time.

The final surprise lay among the hundreds of folded and twisted pages of those letters. It was a group of photographs mounted as postcards, some dating back to World War I and others to the 1930s. Two seemed especially interesting.

The first depicted a sad looking family sitting under a makeshift cover. The message on the back, in Russian, refers to hard times and the death of the head of the family. Judging by the date of the second postcard, 1919, it could be a Jewish family on its way to exile, having been forced by the Turkish authorities to leave Palestine because they were foreign nationals.

We know more about the second postcard. It was written by Yosef in 1919 from Jerusalem to his beloved Yehudit, and depicted a strangely macabre scene: five men clad in white robes dangle from separate gallows while some soldiers are posing for the picture.

Through the miracle of the Internet, we were put in touch with a Hebrew blog, www. israelitomstones. blogspot.com, run by Oded Israeli, and discovered the meaning of this picture. Israeli had traced a descendent of one of the victims and related the following story.

World War I was a terrible time for the Ottoman Empire – the army was losing battles everywhere and soldiers were deserting in great numbers. At first, an amnesty was declared in the hope of luring the deserters back, but when that failed, military police were employed using informers to catch deserters and put them to death.

Yosef Amozig, a recently arrived immigrant from Morocco, was a successful tailor living in Jerusalem. When war broke out, life in Jerusalem grew very difficult. Gamal Pasha, the Turkish commander in chief at the time, made life miserable for the Jewish population. People lost their livelihood and starved to death, leading to epidemics and general demoralization. Amozig closed his workshop, gave his wife a conditional divorce in case he did not return (for fear of leaving her an agunah) and enlisted in the Turkish army; he was posted to Be'er Sheva as a tailor.

Sometime during his stay there, his commander sent him to Jerusalem to buy material for two suits that he wanted made for himself and gave Amozig a three-day pass. Amozig arrived in Jerusalem, bought the material and reopened his workshop, working day and night to make the suits.

At this point, a tragic set of circumstances set in. Informers noticed him working in his workshop, caught him and put him in prison. He did not have the army permit on him. It was somewhere in his house and could not be found. In addition, his commanding officer for whom he was making the suits was suddenly transferred.

Two weeks later, when his wife finally found the permit and ran with it to the prison, it was too late. The gallows were set up in front of Jaffa Gate and five victims were hanged as an example to all others, Yosef Amozig being one of them.

The five victims were two Jews, two Christian Arabs and one Muslim Arab. A large crowd was present, including many dignitaries. The executioner was a Jewish policeman by the name of Mordechai Sasson, who was a good friend of Amozig's and cried all the while he was doing his duty.

At nine o'clock in the evening, the bodies were taken down and brought to burial. Amozig was buried on the Mount of Olives, not yet 30 years old.

A photographer, Chalil Rad, took pictures before the bodies were removed and displayed them in his shop window. According to one version, when the English took over administration of Palestine, they confiscated all existing copies and prohibited them from being displayed.

What a haunting tale! And it took one small postcard, lying like the proverbial needle in the haystack, to bring it back to life.

It is also a great example of why archives are so important.

Naomi Caruso is a writer and Hebrew translator who often volunteers for the CJCCC Archives.

Campus double standards

With theatrical pomp and immaculate precision, the Ann Coulter road show swept across Canada last month, leaving behind it a trail of ruffled feathers and bruised sensibilities.

But even before she set foot in Canada, there was apprehension galore about what the characteristically unpredictable Coulter might say and whom she might offend.

Lawrence Hart in Hamilton

So, in an effort to tone down what he expected might be an overly confrontational session on his campus, University of Ottawa provost Francois Houle took it upon himself to forward her a letter, cautioning her that "Canada puts reasonable limits on freedom of expression" and advising her to "weigh" her words "with respect and civility in mind." He commented as well that "there is a strong tradition in Canada… of restraint, respect and consideration in expressing even provocative and controversial opinions" and he urged her "to respect that Canadian tradition while on our campus."

Following this warning, and very likely emboldened by it, a large and hostile group of demonstrators saw to it that Coulter's presentation at the university was cancelled.

Coulter is recognized for her brash, provocative and dismissive style. Aside from continuously getting up the noses of U.S. liberals, especially Democrats, she is on record for having at various times offended Muslims, Jews, women and gays. As with other conservative pundits she has her supporters. She also has her detractors – many of them.

But it can be argued that how she was dealt with in Ottawa had much less to do with who she is and much more to do with a glaring and grotesque double standard in how "freedom of expression" is handled on our campuses.

When it relates to someone like Coulter or, for that matter, to Daniel Pipes – another so-called "conservative" commentator, whose invitation to speak at York University a few weeks ago was also cancelled – it's apparent that there is a clear proscription against even listening to views that might challenge the politically correct hypocrisy that permeates the halls of the academy.

Conversely, when Israel-bashing exercises such as "Israeli apartheid week" come to campus, even the most egregious Jew-haters are given free rein to spread their lies and distortions. Somehow, the anti-Semitism that masquerades as anti-Zionism is driven by a different set of rules to those that apply to political pundits with contrarian views. Since when do the demonizers and delegitimizers of Israel and Zionism "weigh their words with respect and civility in mind" or "respect Canadian tradition while on our campuses"?

And when was the last time that Houle or his colleagues at York or elsewhere cautioned them to do so?

Israeli Arabs seek equal opportunities

By LESLIE SUSSER
JTA

A mass demonstration by Israeli Arabs highlighted the core contradiction at the heart of the Israeli-Arab experience: demands for greater equality within Israeli society amid growing alienation from the Israeli state.

Leslie Susser in Jerusalem

An estimated 50,000 demonstrators marched in two long columns March 30 to the Galilee town of Sakhnin to commemorate Land Day, an annual protest against unequal distribution of land resources, and in memory of the six Arabs killed in clashes with Israeli security forces in 1976 and the 13 who died in 2000.

For the first time, large numbers of Arab women took part in the annual protest and there was no police presence along the route or violence. The message, however, was not uniform.

While speakers focused mainly on land allocation, thousands of demonstrators waved Palestinian flags, emphasizing their own Palestinian identity and suggesting identification with Palestinians in the West Bank and Gaza.

A few masked men went further. As the procession passed, they hoisted large photographs of Hezbollah leader Hassan Nasrallah and slain Hezbollah operations chief Imad Mugniyeh. The Hezbollah supporters, however, proved to be in the minority and were forced to leave by Sakhnin municipal stewards.

Although public support for Israel's enemies is rare, there can be little doubt that Israeli Arab alienation from the Jewish state is growing.

In late 2006, the Higher Arab Monitoring Committee called for a large measure of Arab political and cultural autonomy. Israeli Jews saw in this a radical demand for separation from the state. Arab leaders countered that it was more a plea for help and a warning of what might happen unless the Jewish majority makes a genuine effort to integrate the 20 per cent-strong Arab minority as fully equal citizens.

The main Arab accusation on Land Day was that the Israeli government continues to destroy illegally built Arab homes, mainly in the Wadi Ara area of central Israel and the Negev desert in the south, without giving the Arabs a chance to expand their villages, towns and cities legally. The Higher Arab Monitoring Committee says the government of Israel is effectively choking land development in Arab urban and rural areas.

The ensuing tensions have been exacerbated by a string of legislative initiatives by Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman, the latest of which is a proposal to open the foreign service only to those who have done military or national service – effectively disqualifying most Arabs.

Lieberman's argument is that Israeli Arabs must be made to realize that sharing in the benefits of Israeli life comes at a price: loyalty to the state. Israeli Arabs, however, see this as discrimination on ethnic grounds.

Writing in Yediot Achronot, Mohammed Zeidan, chair of the Higher Arab Monitoring Committee, insisted that the Israeli-Arab struggle is not anti-Israel and has just two goals: equality within Israeli society, especially with regard to land ownership and use; and a just peace between Israel and the Palestinian people based on two states along the 1967 lines.

"Our central message on Land Day is that we are part of Israeli society and we are struggling to remain part of it," he wrote.

Avishai Braverman, a member of the Labor party and the minister in charge of minority affairs, also said that the men who hoisted the photographs should be punished, but insisted that most Arabs want to be part of Israeli society. Braverman argues that integrating Israeli Arabs as equals in Israeli society is a major strategic interest, for security and economic reasons.

A former World Bank economist and president of Ben-Gurion University, Braverman has established a $40-million fund for projects in Arab communities, and intends to raise more, partly from Diaspora Jews. He argues it would be money well spent in defusing what might otherwise become a major existential threat.

"When I go round the country, Arabs say to me, 'Braverman, we finished the university, now we want jobs here because we have nowhere else to go.' On the other side, there are people creating fear and talking about a fifth column. If we don't want the Israeli Arabs to turn against us, we must embrace them."

BBC propagandists caught in the act

Gen. David Petraeus is a busy man. As head of the American Central Command, he's responsible for the U.S. war efforts in Afghanistan and Iraq, as well as the spill-over in Pakistan, and preventing more 9/11 style attacks from Osama bin Laden and Al Qaeda. He doesn't have time for idle chatter and exchanging pleasantries on the telephone.

But he did have time recently for a highly publicized phone call to Gen. Gabi Ashkenazi, chief of staff of the Israel Defence Forces. Petraeus wanted to correct the flood of false reports, broadcast on the BBC and Al Jazeera, and printed in fringe blogs as well as prestigious journals, in which he allegedly blamed Israel for fanning Arab and Muslim anger, thereby endangering American lives. In the fictitious version, Petraeus was quoted as linking jihadi terror to east Jerusalem construction, thereby "stunning" the White House.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

For the leaders of the campaign to delegitimize and isolate Israel, and strip away its foundation of support from the United States, the invented Petraeus story was perfectly timed. They exploited friction over Jerusalem that surfaced during U.S. Vice-President Joe Biden's recent trip to Israel and continued during Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's meetings with President Barack Obama at the White House.

This activity also took place during the annual AIPAC meeting. Another piece of the invented Petraeus briefing had the U.S. military joining the conspiracy theorists and placing itself in opposition to the "powerful… Israeli lobby" by announcing that "America's relationship with Israel is important, but not as important as the lives of America's soldiers."

On the same day, Israel was also a headline story in London, after the British government expelled the Mossad station chief as punishment for forged U.K. passports linked to the Dubai killing of a Palestinian terror leader.

The veteran propagandists at the BBC merged these two stories, triumphantly declaring Israeli isolation, and broadcasting interviews with Mark Perry, the main purveyor of these fictions. (In contrast, the New York Times avoided the propaganda. Its story on Israeli tensions with the British and American governments didn't mention Petraeus.)

The central role of Perry in all of this is important. Perry is a hyperactive self-promoter – a minor journalist who morphed into an "adviser" to former Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat. In his eagerness to star in the media, Perry peddled rumours that fed his bank account, feeding customers willing to believe anything that weakened Israel.

One version of Perry's propaganda was posted on the website of Foreign Policy, a supposedly prestigious and credible publication. Here, Perry wrote that a briefing team sent by Petraeus had warned of "a growing perception among Arab leaders that the U.S. was incapable of standing up to Israel, that CENTCOM's mostly Arab constituency was losing faith in American promises, that Israeli intransigence on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict was jeopardizing U.S. standing in the region."

The editors neglected to check the facts, or to tell readers that Perry had once been on Arafat's payroll, and then made his living from an NGO (Conflicts Forum) funded by naive European government officials that promote an ideology calling for the legitimation of, and negotiation with, terror groups such as Hamas and Hezbollah. However, Foreign Policy's website also features noted Israel-basher and conspiracy theorist Stephen Walt, and intelligent readers filter fact from fiction.

For the BBC, the embarrassment at being caught in the act is painful. For many years, evidence of anti-Israel bias and crude propaganda has been mounting, including the excellent reports on the BBC Watch website. In 2004, BBC officials were forced to accept an internal investigation, led by Malcolm Balen. But his report has been stamped "top secret," and many of the journalists responsible for the bias continue to be employed by the public broadcaster.

After the Petraeus affair, the need for a full-blown public investigation of the BBC's bias against Israel will be difficult to dismiss. For BBC's audience, the image as the world's most credible source of information on current events has been further tarnished. Caveat emptor.

The Kirshner File

Selections from the Toronto Jewish Film Festival

The annual Toronto Jewish Film Festival is a cultural event of the first magnitude. Judging by the lineup, this year's edition is one of the best, brimming with emotionally and intellectually stimulating documentaries and feature films. A sampler:

The People V.[1] Leon Frank (Tuesday, April 20 at 5:30 p.m. at the Bloor Cinema) charts the course of an appalling incident of racial prejudice in the United States in the early 20th century. It concerns Leo Frank, the Jewish manager of a pencil factory in Atlanta, who was wrongfully convicted of murder and sentenced to be hanged.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Ben Loeterman, the director of this riveting documentary, traces the trajectory of his case through dramatizations, court transcripts, letters written by Frank and his wife to each other and interviews with observers who have a special interest in this miscarriage of justice.

The Frank affair began in 1913 when one of his employees, 13-year-old Mary Phagan, was found murdered in the factory. Suspicion did not immediately fall on Frank, but a pair of detectives who questioned him thought he was nervous and fidgety.

After an African-American employee accused him of being an unsavoury character, Frank was imprisoned. Worse still, a procession of young women who had worked for him claimed he had a leering eye. Frank's trial ignited a wave of hatred and xenophobia throughout Georgia. He was a handy target, a Northerner and a Jew.

The prosecutor was hailed as a hero after Frank was convicted. Thomas Watson, a populist publisher, inflamed the situation by printing anti-Semitic innuendos in his newspaper. Frank appealed, but the U.S. Supreme Court ruled against him. The governor of Georgia commuted his sentence in 1915 after fresh evidence exonerating Frank emerged. A mob, consisting of upstanding citizens, broke into Frank's cell. After abducting him, they lynched Frank, the first and only Jew in American history to meet such a fate. In Phagan's honour, racists in Georgia formed the modern Ku Klux Klan.

A chilling film about racism and a perversion of justice.

As a teenager, I devoured Superman comics. Like my contemporaries in the 1950s and '60s, I was drawn to this larger-than-life hero who could defy villains but who, as Clark Kent, a reticent reporter on the Daily Planet, could churn out fast-breaking news stories on demand. In time, I amassed a considerable collection of comic books chronicling the scintillating adventures of Superman and the characters he knew, including cub reporter Jimmy Olsen and star reporter Lois Lane, Superman's love interest. To my eternal regret, my father threw my priceless collection into a garbage bin.

Brad Ricca's film, Last Son (Tuesday, April 20 at 8:15 p.m. at the Al Green Theatre), brings back nostalgic memories. This engaging documentary, which incorporates never-before-seen archival footage, is a biopic on Superman's Jewish creators, Joe Shuster and Jerome (Jerry) Siegel.

Superman was created by two Jews.

Siegel, a resident of Cleveland, developed the storyline of an amazing man of steel and superhuman powers who disguises himself as a mild-mannered journalist. Shuster, a Toronto-born Canadian who met Siegel in Cleveland, fleshed out Superman's exploits with his kinetic illustrations.

Siegel, a fan of science fiction pulp magazines and a devotee of magic, launched his career by writing stories for the high school paper. Shuster, a body-builder, was on the same wavelength as Siegel. According to Ricca, the boys were influenced by the supernatural tale of the Golem, the short stories of Edgar Rice Burroughs and the swashbuckling Tarzan movies.

By all accounts, Benny Friedman, the all-American college quarterback, served as one of the physical models of Superman. Lois Lane was supposedly modelled after two women Siegel fell for: Lois Amster, a fellow high school student, and Joanne Kovacs, his second wife. Siegel is said to have plucked Lois Lane's name from a pulp magazine.

Alas, Siegel and Shuster imprudently burned the prototype of their first Superman comic, which was rejected by countless publishers. Their second and successful prototype was rescued from the slush pile by an underling at Action Comics. To their lasting misfortune, they sold away the rights for a measly $130. Last Son recounts the rise of Superman with style and panache.

Hillel Kook, otherwise known as Peter Bergson, was a driven person who was committed to saving Jews in peril during the Holocaust. He acquired his passion after reading an account about the reported murder of two million Jews under Nazi occupation. Incredibly enough, it was buried on page 8 in the Washington Post.

Peter Bergson

Pierre Sauvage's indignant film, Not Idly By: Peter Bergson, America and the Holocaust (Wednesday, April 21 at 3: 30 p.m. at the Bloor Cinema), derives its title from a comment uttered by Bergson. "We stood idly by," he declared, charging that mainstream Jewish organizations did precious little to try to rescue their brethren in Europe.

A Zionist Revisionist born in Lithuania and raised in Palestine, Bergson's accusations are contained in a television interview he conducted in 1978, 23 years before his death. Accusing Jewish leaders, particularly Rabbi Stephen Wise, of inaction and silence, he leaves no doubt that fewer Jews would have been killed had American Jews acted decisively and lobbied the U.S. government for support. At the very least, he observes, the Allies could have bombed Auschwitz. "We could have slowed the massacre," he claims.

Not Idly By packs quite a punch.

Fabrice Genestal's feature film, Hidden Children (Sunday, April 18 at 1 p.m. at the Bloor Cinema and Tuesday, April 20 at 4:30 p.m. at Silver City Richmond Hill), unfolds during the Holocaust in France, and is inspired by real events. A Jewish couple in danger of deportation entrusts their two young sons, Robert and Gerald Finaly, to the care of a Catholic woman. When she is denounced, she hands over the boys to a convent in Paris.

Eventually, they are hidden by a devoutly pious Christian woman whose theological view of Jews is less than benevolent. After World War II, their saviour and the boys' aunt in Palestine lock horns in an epic battle for their custody that embroils the Catholic church, the Vatican, the chief rabbi and the courts. An expertly crafted movie, Hidden Children explores a facet of the Holocaust that disrupted untold lives long after the Nazis had gone down to defeat.

The late William Kunstler was a radical American civil rights and criminal lawyer who stood up to injustice and risked his reputation by aligning himself with unpopular defendants. His daughters, Emily and Sarah, are the co-directors of William Kunstler: Disturbing the Universe (Sunday, April 25 at 3:30 p.m. at the Bloor Cinema), which is billed as an attempt to understand a complex individual. Kunstler, who started as an unremarkable lawyer in suburban America, fought for African-Americans and native Indians and protested the war in Vietnam.

He also defended the assassin of Rabbi Meir Kahane, the perpetrators of the 1993 World Trade Centre bombing, a rapist, a drug dealer and Mafia kingpin John Gotti. However, the case that transformed him into a fullblown national celebrity was the Chicago 8 trial in 1969, which turned on free speech and the First Amendment.

In general, the filmmakers admire their father, but they are puzzled and alienated by some of his choices.

Hermann Leiningen, grandson of King Boris III of Bulgaria [Ron Csillag photo]
Inset: King Boris III of Bulgaria

Bulgarian king lauded for saving Jews

By RON CSILLAG
Special to The CJN

Hermann Leiningen is soft-spoken, humble and unfailingly polite – traits he says he inherited from the grandfather he never met.

Something you wouldn't know right away about the unassuming Toronto banker, despite just a hint of a regal bearing, is that his full title is His Serene Highness, Prince Hermann Friedrich Fernando Roland zu Leiningen.

That's right: "Prince." A real one.

He's the great-grandson of King Victor Emmanuel III of Italy, and through his father, a direct descendant of Queen Victoria. He is 126th in line to the British throne.

A more direct royal bloodline is via his late grandfather, King Boris III of Bulgaria, a much-loved monarch among whose lesser-known exploits was his refusal to surrender his country's Jews to the Nazis during World War II, resulting in the rescue of Bulgaria's 50,000-strong Jewish population.

Which is why on April 14 at 8 p.m., Leiningen, a 46-year-old Orthodox Christian, will accept an award from Chabad of Markham paying posthumous tribute to his heroic grandfather. The honour is to be presented to him by a group of Bulgarian Holocaust survivors who owe their lives to King Boris.

The story may not be as well-known as King Christian's rescue of his Jewish subjects in Denmark, but it's certainly no less dramatic: despite several meetings with Adolf Hitler, Boris, referred to in history books variously as king or czar, steadfastly refused to ship his country's Jews to Nazi-occupied Poland and its death mills.

In fact, Leiningen, an international investment expert with RBC, told The CJN in a recent interview that despite intense demands from Berlin, the king stuck to his "three nos:" no war with Russia, no German occupation of Bulgaria and no deportations of Jews.

"He was neutral in many ways," Leiningen said, gazing out onto Toronto's skyline from his 23rd floor office. "And I think [by] being neutral, in many instances, he postponed making big decisions by saying 'not now.'"

Boris ascended to the throne in 1918 following Bulgaria's defeat in World War I. When World War II broke out, the country declared neutrality, but joined the Axis in March 1941. In return, Bulgaria annexed lands it had longed claimed, namely, western Thrace from Greece and Macedonia from Yugoslavia.

As a Nazi ally, Bulgaria enacted anti-Jewish legislation. The Law for the Protection of the Nation prohibited Jews from voting, running for office, working for the government, intermarrying or owning land.

Even so, Boris had forged several personal relationships with members of the Jewish community. And his father, King Ferdinand, had personally financed the building of the synagogue in 1909 in the capital, Sofia.

Historians agree there was also a general absence of anti-Semitism among the populace. Most Bulgarian Jews were highly assimilated.

Some historians, however, have been less than kind to Boris, claiming he was weak-willed and sided with the Nazis only to regain lost territories. They've alleged that the dangerous game of protecting Jews fell mainly to one of his government ministers, Dimiter Peshev, and the Bulgarian Orthodox Church.

But as "an absolute monarch, the final decisions had to be made by [the king], regardless of what the parliament or church said," Leiningen counters. He lauds the people of Bulgaria and the church, but "it was a combined effort."

Besides, "had my grandfather not had this loose alliance with Germany, the Germans would have come into Bulgaria, would have gone into Russia, and the chances are, like in all the other occupied territories, there would have been deportations of Jews."

Chabad honours Bulgarian king

What Boris was unable to accomplish, however, was to save the Jews of the newly administered regions of Thrace and Macedonia. A total of 11,385 of these Jews were rounded up by Bulgarian forces and shipped to Treblinka.

Leiningen recognizes that as a sore point.

"Well, they were part of a territory that had been occupied by Germany, and as a result, it was a lot more difficult."

Leiningen, who was born in Toronto and has three real-life princesses for daughters, doesn't advertise his royal status, but he doesn't shy away from it either.

"My mother always said, 'Don't publicize, but be proud of your background. If someone asks, be available and tell the story.'

"I love talking about it. I'm learning more every day about my background."

And the story has no shortage of intrigue.

For one, King Boris died under mysterious circumstances just two weeks after his final meeting with Hitler in the summer of 1943. He was not yet 50. For decades, conspiracy theories swirled that he was administered a slow poison by Hitler's henchmen or murdered by Communist agents who knew that Bulgaria was about to fall into their hands and thought it would be easier to rule without a king.

(Boris's body was never found, but his heart was discovered after the Communists' fall in the early 1990s. An autopsy revealed that he likely died of a heart attack brought on by extreme stress).

By that time, Germany needed Bulgaria as an ally, because Italy had surrendered just six days after Boris' death. One year after that, the Red Army entered Bulgaria.

Banker's grandfather saved Jews during war

Boris was replaced on the throne by his six-year-old son, Simeon, who ruled by regency until 1946, when the Communists abolished the monarchy. They also executed Leiningen's great-uncle and all members of Bulgaria's parliament.

But Simeon wasn't through. He triumphantly returned to post-Communist Bulgaria and was the country's prime minister from 2001 to 2005.

Meanwhile, Leiningen's parents, Prince Karl and Princess Maria Luisa, came to Canada in the late 1950s. The German-born Karl had a soft spot for the country, says his son, because he'd been captured by Canadian troops while serving with the German army during World War II.

He stayed in Canada until 1969 and spent the last 20 years of his life in Vered HaGalil, a horse ranch and farm on the Sea of Galilee. What drew him to Israel? "No one could really figure it out," Leiningen says.

As for what motivated his grandfather to defy Hitler and save "his" Jews, Leiningen doesn't pause: "He was a very believing and spiritual man. His belief in God and God's will, were likely the biggest factors in helping make the decisions he made."

Chabad of Markham plans to unveil a "Tolerance Garden" at its Green Lane location to recognize King Boris and other notables who saved Jews during the Holocaust.

Leiningen says he's "overwhelmed" by Chabad's award, but "it's really for my grandfather. It's for what he did and the people he helped."

Yom Hashoah V'Hagvurah

Community service draws 2,500 to Earl Bales

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

As a Holocaust survivor, Peter Silverman is often asked if he wants revenge on the Nazis. His answer is simple. He's already gotten his revenge.

"When I went to Israel, to a public school, I saw hundreds of kids yelling and jumping. This is my revenge. We won. We are here," he said.

Silverman, a co-founder of the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem, was one of about 2,500 Torontonians to attend the Yom Hashoah v'Hagvurah community Holocaust commemoration on Sunday in Earl Bales Park. The memorial – which is sponsored by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem and the federation's Sarah and Chaim Neuberger Holocaust Education Centre– is the second-largest of its kind in the world, followed only by the ceremony in Israel.

As one of the organizers, Silverman spent three months working on logistics. He did it for the same reason that he helped found the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem in 1985.

"We realized that Holocaust deniers are very smart. If they can deny [the Holocaust] when I'm alive, what's going to happen when I'm gone?... At our age, we're losing a few [survivors] every year," said Silverman, who participated in the event's candlelighting ceremony. "[We need to] make sure this is remembered forever."

Lorraine Sandler, chair of the Sarah and Chaim Neuberger Holocaust Education Centre, sees the event as a chance to educate the community.

"We have many aging survivors who we need to commemorate," she said. "We also have children and grandchildren who understand their obligation... to be the bearers of [survivors'] stories."

For Sandler, hearing these stories is a way to put a face to a staggering number.

"The idea of six million is so enormous," she said. "For six million people, there are six million stories."

Judy Weissenberg Cohen, a Holocaust survivor who was the keynote speaker at the event, agrees.

At the ceremony, which included a speech by Amir Gissin, Israel's consul general in Toronto, Weissenberg Cohen discussed the role of women during the Holocaust and their unique struggles, which she saw first-hand in Auschwitz-Birkenau.

"The most degrading phase for women... was played out in the death camps. As a survivor of the camps, I'm a witness to this," she said, adding that, for the Nazis, a woman's life was intertwined with her child's.

"To enter Auschwitz visibly pregnant was a definite death sentence," she said. "One of the most heart-breaking tasks was for women to collect empty strollers from the gas chambers."

Keren Romm, 29, who attended the ceremony, sees the event as an opportunity for Toronto youth to humanize the Holocaust.

"I think it allows the survivors to come together and be respected," she said. "[For kids], it takes it out of the classrooms."

The Law Society of Upper Canada, in partnership with B'nai Brith Canada, held a Holocaust memorial event on Monday to mark National Holocaust Memorial Day.

Statement by Liberal Leader Michael Ignatieff on Holocaust Memorial Day

"On Yom Hashoah, we remember a crime against humanity whose horror stands through time as a stark reminder of man's capacity for evil. We also remember the courage of those who survived, and we honour those who still live among us.

We remember the righteous among the nations, who risked their own lives to save others.

On Yom Hashoah, as Canadians, we pay tribute to the men and women of our armed forces, who liberated Europe from Nazi tyranny. And we recall, with enduring shame, the indifference of "none is too many."

We will always remain vigilant against all forms of hatred, racism and discrimination. We will keep faith with the memory of the six million, and the lives of the survivors. And we will look forward with hope to a future where the world knows the serenity of tolerance and peace."

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

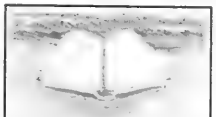
The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Jewish Life

Paths to enlightenment

By RABBI LEIGH LERNER

The Italians say, "I medici e la guerra spopolare la terra," medics and war depopulate the earth. This week's parshah, Tazria-Metzora, discusses the priestly practices concerning skin diseases that might do the same. However, these Torah portions don't really focus on medicine: they focus on keeping "the camp," i.e. the community, holy. They deal with public spirituality.



Rabbinic Reflections

We are in an age of private spirituality. Individual religious concerns centre on the inner being of the person. Wider communal concerns play a smaller role.

Everyone knows the story of the Jewish woman who climbed the Himalayas to meet the Great Guru of Nepal. She was allowed to speak only three words to this Zen master, so she said, "Sheldon, come home." The quest for personal spirituality permits religious seekers to wander far from the tradition in which they were raised.

Maimonides laid out a four-step program for individual spirituality. In his program, the lowest level of spirituality revolves around things. The Rambam considers people who relate to the world through things as at a low level of spiritual development, for all things pass away and are bound to fail spiritually.

Maimonides' next level up the scale of spirituality relates to family. Those who find inspiration in their family have moved a step forward. In family, we find love, joy, a future and a hope, the foundations of Jewish living.

Still, a family without ethical principles may provide love and solidarity, but it fails to improve the wider world. So the next spiritual rung on Maimonides' ladder takes us to the level of ethics. In ethical action, we improve the world around us and practise those mitzvot, those commandments that affect relations between one human being and another.

Maimonides remains convinced, however, that most ethical practices simply reflect the mores of the day, and not some eternal goodness. While moral behaviour deserves the highest respect and manifests a level of spirituality approaching the heights, it does not sit at the top.

What, then, does Maimonides consider the highest level of spirituality? When the Torah describes God as speaking face to face with Moses, Maimonides interprets this to mean that Moses and God were on the same wavelength. In Star Trek terms, they had a Vulcan mind meld. Moses could attune himself to the Divine mind and apprehend God's thoughts. Maimonides' peak spirituality might seem to reflect today's individual spirituality, but look at how Maimonides proposes we arrive there.

First, we must be highly educated. To Rambam that meant being steeped in Torah and biblical literature, Talmud and Greek philosophy, the science of his age. With education, the mind could become attuned to divine emanations. Then whoever desired to exercise high-level spirituality must also become a leader, learning how to form the opinions and the actions of his community.

Comparing today's inner spirituality to Maimonides' program, we see that today's concerns, which centre on inner feelings and inner judgment, reflect the influence of romanticism, an exaggerated emphasis on the will and the emotions of the individual. Today's spirituality centres on the quick fix, as opposed to the long and intellectually challenging education. Today's spirituality lacks an emphasis on learning to lead and the ethical service to community leadership requires.

We can be heartened by the emphasis on spirituality today. Perhaps the contemporary world will rediscover forms of training similar to those prescribed by Maimonides, requiring study of texts, training for leadership and service to community. May those who advocate a personal, private spirituality find inspiration in a world far greater than themselves alone.

Rabbi Leigh Lerner is spiritual leader of Temple Emanu-El-Beth Sholom in Montreal.

Case for God is complex but lucid

The Case for God* by Karen Armstrong, Alfred A. Knopf, publisher.

Karen Armstrong is an acclaimed scholar of world religions and an astonishingly prolific author.

The Case for God, although lengthy and complex, is at the same time lucid and eloquent. The volume contains informative and enlightening chapters on such subjects as faith and reason, atheism, unknowing, death of God, science and religion and silence.

Bookmarks
Bernard Baskin

For many readers, her response to the recent outspoken critics of religion will be of greatest interest.

In her introduction to the book she writes, "There is a long religious tradition that stressed the importance of recognizing the limits of our knowledge, of silence, reticence and awe. That is what I hope to explore in this book. One of the conditions of enlightenment has always been a willingness to let go of what we thought we knew in order to appreciate truths we had never dreamed of. We may have to unlearn a great deal about religion before we can move on to new insight."

She asserts that nothing about God can be put into words. The mystery at the heart of religious belief is ineffable, unapproachable by reason or language. God is a metaphor or symbol for the kind of spirituality that flows from immersion in the realms of art or music.

That almost mystical enhancement, the result of sustained effort and practice, is the kind of religion beyond words that can make modern men and women more forgiving, courageous, selfless and helpful.

Much of this seems beyond what the average person would regard as meaningful or useful religious belief. Avowed atheist Richard Dawkins has said that Armstrong must be living in a dream world if she expects fundamentalists of all religious faiths to accept her abstruse, rarified approach to God.

More than 800 years ago, some rabbis, in their opposition to the teachings of Maimonides, argued that a God concept, purged of all anthropomorphism is too abstract to be comforting. "The God of the philosophers is too remote" to be addressed as "Thou." Absolute logic demolishes faith, and no amount of post-logical rationalizing can restore the trust with which the unsophisticated pietist turns to God.

Maimonides' impact on Judaism was least enduring in the realm of theology and philosophy.

The Case for God offers open-minded seekers for new religious insights much to contemplate and digest.

Shattering Glass* by Nancy-Gay Rotstein, Penguin Press.

The author of this absorbing novel, first published some years ago, now available in a splendid new enlarged format, has attracted the attention of readers in 10 countries.

Nancy-Gay Rotstein, acclaimed for her books of poetry, has had extensive experience in the fields of law, politics, business and the arts.

Shattering Glass is the cautionary tale of three successful women who have overcome a variety of obstacles to attain gratifying high positions at an unenviable cost in family dysfunction and breakdown.

Was it all worth it – the strivings, unsavoury compromises, neglect of children, conflict with husbands and unwelcome pangs of conscience?

At the book's conclusion, sharing in the ambience of an Italian spa, Judy, Dede and Barbara are startled by an unexpected ambiguous telegram. Each fears the ominous message it bears. Suddenly, readers are confronted with their anxiety, guilt and multiple fears.

The author, with an unerring ear for dialogue, a poet's gift for language and the limning of character has written a creative work that resonates long after the book has been completed.

Jewish Life

The pros and cons of Shoah education

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

The current status of Holocaust education reflects perhaps a mixed blessing. On the one hand, the level of pedagogy in regard to the Shoah has clearly improved in recent years. Even as recently as 1992, the eminent historian, the late Lucy Dawidowicz, in her essay How They Teach the Holocaust, could lament what she saw as the woeful state of affairs in terms of materials that were ill-conceived and unsophisticated and curricula that were overly sentimental and taught badly. On the other hand, the use of the Holocaust in Jewish education continues to escalate, leading to fundamental questions about its actual purpose in a Jewish curriculum and whether it is relied upon too heavily to inspire forms of Jewish identity that have withered in certain quarters.

The automatic gravitas that accompanies the introduction of the Shoah in the classroom clearly has benefits. Teachers can expect a certain level of student attentiveness, given that the usual fidgeting and talking in the midst of a lesson, if it occurred in the midst of the recounting the burning bodies of Auschwitz, would be insensitive to say the least.

But talking about painful death in mass numbers – what Stacy Weiner aptly called "teaching the unteachable" – will certainly test the skill of the teacher to coax the student out of either escaping from the material or, worse, relegating it to the mundane. As Weiner asserts, "Faced with nightmarish images – gassing, cremation, rampant disease and hunger – a student may snatch his mind away as instinctively as he would pull his hand from a fire."

It was Emil Fackenheim who converted memory of the Shoah into a kind of contemporary formula for Jewish continuity. His "614th" commandment – "do not hand Hitler any posthumous victories" – was a rallying cry linking Jewish assimilation and intermarriage directly to post-Holocaust guilt. After Auschwitz, one is commanded to maintain Jewish tradition and marry within the fold so as not to trivialize the sacrifice of six million martyrs or ironically help Hitler "finish the job" that he started.

But despite the initial appeal of Fackenheim's concept, capturing, as David Singer asserts, "the sentiments… of Jewish shoe salesmen, accountants, policemen, cab-drivers, secretaries," it has become difficult from an educational perspective to forge a continuous and positive Jewish identity simply as a refutation of heinous anti-Semitism. (Or as a secular student of mine once remarked, "The Holocaust makes me anti-Nazi, not pro-Halachah.")

Notwithstanding the great amount of resources poured into Holocaust education for both young people and adults, the risk of what Simone Schweber documents in her article Holocaust Fatigue in Teaching Today is very real. As Schweber argues, the atmosphere in classrooms has shifted from what she calls "Holocaust awe" to a default position in which the Shoah is seen as interesting, but not awesome: "Where I once worried that the sanctification of the Holocaust stifled learning, I now worry that trivialization of the Holocaust impedes its understanding."

Remembering the martyred Jewish dead is a sacred and solemn obligation. But memorializing them as the sole marker of one's Jewishness is fraught with peril, and ultimately such a strategy will have trouble withstanding the lure of assimilation and, of course – especially as the last survivors leave us – the simple passage of time.

Hebrew and Israeli apps

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Last week, we looked at some of the free Jewish-themed apps you can find in Apple's App Store that can be downloaded and run on an iPhone, iPod Touch and soon in Canada, the iPad. The store contains more than 150,000 applications (programs). These apps take advantage of the iPhone's sophistication and portability to provide you with solutions to problems you probably don't even know you have. [bit.ly/happ01]

Israeli programmers have been hard at work creating Hebrew-language apps for the iPhone. Many of these deliver the news, help teach you some basic Hebrew vocabulary and maybe even answer your prayers. Most of these apps are in Hebrew only, but even if you're not fluent in the language, try downloading a few. After all, they're all free.

Yom Ha'atzmaut events focus on Israeli arts

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

The Consulate General of Israel is sponsoring a feast for the eyes of Torontonians in celebration of Israel's 62nd Independence Day.

On Tuesday, April 20, an eclectic array of Israeli art and design will be on concurrent displays at galleries across the city in three daylong exhibits.

While the public is welcome to visit the exhibits, the consulate has issued invitations allowing free access for diplomats, politicians and various media representatives so that they can experience Israeli arts and culture as part of this year's Yom Ha'atzmaut festivities.

An installation called From Melting Pot Into the Fire: Contemporary Ceramics in Israel will be on display at the Gardiner Museum (111 Queen's Park) from 10 a.m to 6 p.m.

Visitors will have the chance to view ceramic creations by 42 leading Israeli artists.

According to the museum website, guests will be exposed to "37 works of art that were originally shown in 2007 as part of the Fourth Biennale for Israeli Ceramics at the Eretz Israel Museum in Tel Aviv. Many of the works in the exhibition are highly conceptual and address complex issues involving questions of identity and the uncertainty of life in contemporary Israel."

The exhibition runs until May 9.

Meanwhile, on Bay Street, the consulate will also host From Mediterranean Traditional to Israeli Contemporary Design, at the Design Exchange (234 Bay St.) from 10 a.m. to 5 p.m.

The Design Exchange calls the exhibition one of "current Israeli industrial design, examining what makes this country unique on the world stage. The exciting, dramatic and colourful pieces on display include furniture, lighting, and recreation equipment."

This collection is on display until June 20.

Lastly, in the Distillery District, at the Julie M. Gallery (55 Mill St., Bldg. 37), the newest collection of works by award-winning Israeli painter Anat Betzer, titled "Purple Rain," will be displayed from 11 a.m. to 6 p.m.

Betzer's work will be featured at the gallery until April 25.

Asked why there is a focus on arts and culture for this anniversary, Amir Gissin, Israeli consul general for Toronto and Western Canada, said: "Israeli culture is becoming central to the strategy of our work. We believe that by exposing the public to Israeli culture, our job becomes easier, because they learn about Israel from new [avenues] that they were never exposed to before. Be that design, ceramics or paintings."

He added this is more of a chance for people outside the Jewish and Israeli communities to discover different aspects of Israel.

"This shows our [invited] guests what Israel has to offer beyond the regular, traditional, diplomatic reception," he said.

Gissin said capitalizing on the exhibits – all of which had started their runs in the city earlier this year – was a "natural" decision.

The day will be capped by UJA Federation's of Greater Toronto's Community Yom Ha'atzmaut celebration, an early evening outdoor party from 4:30 to 8 p.m. at Mel Lastman Square (5100 Yonge St.).

Partygoers will be treated to live Israeli music, inflatable carnival rides, arts and crafts, children's entertainment and Israeli food.

The event will also feature a live concert by Jaffa Road, the acclaimed Toronto-based world music group. The group was nominated for a 2010 Juno Award for world music album of the year.

Temple Sinai honours 'keeper of sacred music'

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Ben Steinberg has spent half his life serving Toronto's Temple Sinai Congregation, where he is composer-in-residence.

On the synagogue's website, Steinberg is credited as "our guardian of tradition and keeper of sacred music." To honour him and celebrate his 80th birthday, which was in January, the synagogue is hosting a musical celebration on Friday, April 30.

The evening will feature the Cleveland Duo and James Umble, a musical trio who as part of their performance will perform Asei L'cha Rav, originally written in honour of the retirement of Temple Sinai's founding Rabbi Jordan Pearlson, who died in 2008. The piece features a traditional misheberach prayer that blesses those who serve their communities.

In his comfortable and calm office at the temple, Steinberg spoke of his "very close and warm relationship" with the congregation. After he retired as music director in 1996, he was invited to stay on in his current role.

"I'm still composing, and sometimes I continue to do a little bit of lecturing," Steinberg said. His career has included travel to several American cities, as well as Hong Kong and Australia, often as a scholar-in-residence.

A Japanese koto – a stringed musical instrument – on display in his office is a souvenir from Japan, where Steinberg has toured four times, most recently three years ago.

A widely respected composer, conductor and lecturer, Steinberg has received numerous awards and honours, including two from the city of Jerusalem, where he was an artist-in-residence in 1978. His 1979 cantata, Echoes of Children, commemorating the 1.5 million children murdered in the Holocaust, won a prestigious International Gabriel broadcasting award.

A native of Winnipeg who grew up in Toronto, Steinberg was a child soloist by the age of eight and conducted his first synagogue choir four years later. His father, the late Cantor Alexander Steinberg, who had immigrated from Russia, was serving Shaarei Shomayim Congregation at the time.

Ben Steinberg

After completing his studies at Toronto's Royal Conservatory of Music and the University of Toronto, Steinberg got his professional start composing for radio and television shows in the 1950s.

But he never really left synagogue music, he said. "The path I was most comfortable with was synagogue music. I loved it. I remember from my earliest childhood that the two forces that were strongest in my life were music and Judaism. That was my identity."

He had minimal contact with Reform Judaism until about 1950, when he discovered that "good music was going on" within the movement.

"My [Orthodox] father, to his everlasting credit, encouraged my path."

Most of Steinberg's work is inspired by Jewish text, he said. The Hebrew words have "great depth and meaning… [connecting] us to our peoplehood and to our past."

Sounding a lighter, personal note, Steinberg – who is also an amateur carpenter and a grandfather of four – said it's fun to deal with the texts in the context of the music, which may be more modern.

The word "fun" crops up often when Steinberg talks about his work, despite his seriousness about the music and about imparting his knowledge of aspects of Jewish music ranging from Yiddish – his first language – to Yemenite Jewish music.

"You can sweeten the teaching process if you can use humour," he noted. "But the purpose was always very serious. I wanted Jews to learn more about Judaism and our tradition."

That was the basis for the series he founded 40 years ago at Temple Sinai, named – with deliberate intent – "Our Musical Legacy." An affiliated award for young Jewish musicians – some of whom are now affiliated with major symphony orchestras – was renamed in Steinberg's honour on his retirement.

Among the events Steinberg organized at the temple over the years were chamber music performances, and an annual Yiddish night that Steinberg "stretched" to include Sephardi music.

"I got a kick out of that," he said.

USDS becomes Robbins Hebrew Academy

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

United Synagogue Day School is changing its name to Robbins Hebrew Academy (RHA), effective this week.

The change, which is being announced April 15 at a ribbon-cutting ceremony on each of the school's two campuses, acknowledges a $4-million gift from Larry Robbins, a USDS grandparent and Toronto builder and developer.

The gift – which has been designated as an endowment fund to enhance education and ensure the perpetuity of the school – pays tribute to the memory of Robbins' wife, Miriam, who died two years ago.

Education, specifically Jewish education, was very important to her, said Monty Robbins, Larry and Miriam's son. Her father, Rabbi Isaac Aronoff, who died in 2004, had a shul in his home for about 50 years, Monty said.

Larry Robbins

As well, the gift reflects changing times, according to school president Leonard Abramsky. While the word "Hebrew" emphasizes the school's roots, he said, "we felt that 'day school' kind of hearkened back to previous generations... 'Academy' [suggests] a wider scope of educational possibilities in today's vernacular."

Claire Sumerlus, who became head of school in March 2009, told The CJN that "our children have to be able to think critically, which has been a major focus for the last year and a half, and they have to know how to problem-solve."

As well, she noted, the school has implemented a new literacy program to help children who are having difficulty learning to read, and also to enhance skills for those who are already reading, and track all students' progress every six weeks.

A committee including board members, parents and staff members chose the school's new name, which was then approved by the board.

RHA will remain an affiliate of the Solomon Schechter Day School Association, the day school network connected to the Conservative movement. The school is one of the largest, if not the largest, in the organization, Sumerlus said.

"My grandchildren have benefited from the amazing education, warm community and strong sense of tradition that is taught at USDS," Larry Robbins said in a statement. "Jewish education was very important to my wife, Miriam, and I am thrilled to be able to invest in this school and its growth into the 21st century."

Claire Sumerlus

USDS began as part of Beth Tzedec Congregation in 1957 and became an independent school in 1961. It serves more than 800 students from junior kindergarten to Grade 8, and operates at two campuses, one at Beth Tzedec and the other at Beth Tikvah Synagogue.

A third campus is planned for the Lebovic community campus in Vaughan, but there is no timeline for that at the moment, said both Sumerlus and Abramsky.

"We're focusing on our existing building and strengthening our existing two campuses before moving on to Lebovic," Abramsky said.

A Richmond Hill branch closed in 2006.

"It's an exciting time to be in our old school and new school," Sumerlus said. "Things are happening and changing."

The idea behind the donation was to sustain the long-term future of the school, Monty Robbins said. "It's very exciting that all the planning is coming to fruition."

Entrepreneur donates $2M to World ORT

JTA

Canadian entrepreneur Seymour Schulich has donated $2 million to World ORT, the largest gift ever from a Canadian to the global Jewish educational organization.

Schulich's gift will establish the Schulich Canada Smart Classroom Initiative, which "will bring a new dimension to teaching, generating class interaction with educational software, websites, and other resources," according to a March 31 statement from World ORT.

The initiative, part of Kadima Mada, World ORT's programming arm in Israel, will launch 411 "smart classrooms" in northern Israel. It will include equipment, teacher-training programs, development of learning materials, upgrades and maintenance.

Schools selected for the project have been identified by Israel's Ministry of Education and Ministry for the Development of the Galilee and the Negev as being in areas of "economic and social distress."

The classrooms will be provided with laptops that connect to a wireless network linking students' computers to the teacher's workstation and whiteboard. Some 40,000 students are expected to benefit from the initiative.

Teachers also will be equipped with hand-held tablet computers so they can walk around classrooms. "Smart classrooms" also will be able to access World ORT's videoconferencing network.

"I am extremely grateful to Seymour Schulich for this outstanding donation," Robert Singer, director general and CEO of World ORT, said in a statement. "Today, education is the best investment in the future for the Jewish people and for the future of the State of Israel."

Seymour Schulich

Schulich's gift was partnered through UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

Federation president Ted Sokolsky told The CJN that his organization is playing a role at the request of Schulich, who is involved in its Jewish camp incentive program, Top Bunk.

The federation's role in the ORT donation included "due diligence" on the project and "stewarding" the gift, Sokolsky said. The federation is involved with ORT on a number of international projects, he added.

"It's a great gift," said Sokolsky, who is familiar with the recipient communities from work the federation has done there. "It's a capacity-building gift… [Schulich] has always had a great belief in the power of education."

The donation will be matched by an additional $9.75 million from World ORT, the Israeli ministries of education and of the Negev and Galilee, local authorities, and ORT donors.

Schulich is well known for his philanthropy, notably to a number of Canadian universities, as well as to the Technion - Israel Institute of Technology.

On the contrary, you go there to live.

At a certain age, retirement suddenly turns back into work. Your health is not what it used to be, chores around the house aren't getting done, and time spent with friends and family becomes less frequent. This is a time when many seniors view moving to an Independent Living community as much more like a beginning than an end.

At Sunrise Senior Living, we understand a senior's need for socialization, independence and a release from the burdens of maintaining a home. We focus on the details of living, offering a range of lifestyle options. Our communities offer beautifully appointed apartments, housekeeping, delicious meals and engaging activities. Everything you need to live life on your terms.

Our mission is to champion the quality of life for all seniors, and we've been doing it since 1981. Visit or call one of our communities today, and discover what living is like at Sunrise.

Obituary

York U educator was more than a prof

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Arthur Siegel, a professor emeritus in York University's division of social science and communications studies and a former journalist with Radio Canada International, died April 7 from complications resulting from multiple myeloma. He was 80.

Siegel spent much of the last 34 years teaching at York on the political, economic and cultural dimensions of mass communication.

But to his family and friends, he was much more than a professor. To them, Siegel was a man imbued with natural good humour and a zest for life.

This love of life was etched into his soul early on while growing up in Trinidad – his family fled there from Germany just prior to the start of World War II – where the joyful sounds of calypso music constantly filled the air and where he witnessed his parents constantly practising tzedakah and tikkun olam with their island neighbours, according to his cousin, Pinchas Gutter.

Arthur Siegel

Recalling his "closest friend", Gutter told The CJN last week that Siegel was the "kindest, happiest person" he'd ever known.

"He loved humanity, and his joie de vivre was such that Arthur made friends wherever he went," Gutter said, adding: "The way I can encapsulate him best is to say that when I first met Arthur, he made me feel like it was the greatest thing that ever happened to him. He was that way with all his family and friends."

A gifted orator, Siegel used this same spirit to attract and endear many of the thousands of students who took his courses over the years.

David Collin, one of Siegel's undergraduate students from 2001 to 2003 at York, who now works as The CJN's promotions manager, said he was always impressed by the professor's "extremely learned" knowledge of mass communications.

According to his immediate family, Siegel was also a talented storyteller who regaled them with many tales of his interviews during his career as a journalist – particularly of talks he'd conducted with star hockey players over the years.

While working for the CBC in Montreal – where the Siegel family lived until 1976 before moving to Toronto – he befriended Montreal Canadiens' icons Maurice "Rocket" Richard and Jacques Plante. The former would lunch with Siegel regularly and the latter knitted him a tuque in appreciation of his friendship and professionalism, his daughter, Alisa Siegel, told The CJN just prior to his funeral last week.

She described her father as a "newspaper hound" who would read every paper available. But superseding all else was his devotion as a father, grandfather and husband.

"Arthur was an adoring and incredibly involved father… in the details of our daily lives. He spoke to each of us several times a day, talked to us about anything and everything that was going on in our lives. He showed us again and again that we were his greatest joy. We felt it in everything he did. No matter how busy he was, no matter what was going on, he always had time, made time," Alisa said.

Siegel also made many contributions to the Jewish community, both at home in Toronto and internationally.

Locally, he was an energetic fundraiser for Baycrest in his role as chairman of the honour roll and of the men's executive service group. He also served as president of the Canadian Friends of Tel Aviv University and was a member of the university's board of governors until his death.

Siegel leaves behind Mireille, his wife of 48 years; his three daughters Ariane, Alisa and Maura; six grandchildren and many friends and relatives.

"This is a loss that everyone who knew him feels profoundly," Alisa said through tears.

He was laid to rest at Pardes Shalom cemetery last Friday.

York U 'de-registers' student for web postings

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

A student accused of running an anti-Semitic website has been "de-registered" by York University, a school spokesperson said.

"He is no longer a student at York," Keith Marnoch, the university's associate director of media relations, told The CJN last week.

But he said Salman Hossain wasn't formally expelled.

"Expulsion... can have academic [implications]... attached to it. We basically just removed him as a student from York," Marnoch said, adding that this was a university decision.

Hossain has been accused of running Filthy Jewish Terrorists, an Arizona-based website that refers to Jews as "diseased and filthy," "the scum of the earth," "fanatic, genocidal maniacs," "psychotic" and "mass murderers."

The site also said "a genocide should be perpetrated against the Jewish populations of North America and Europe."

York suspended Hossain last month and ordered him to appear before a disciplinary panel.

When asked why Hossain wasn't de-registered earlier, Marnoch said "we had to look at what we were doing in a detailed way to make sure everything was appropriate, but we are satisfied that we did what we needed to do.

Hossain is still the subject of a hate crimes investigation, according to the Ontario Provincial Police, because it's illegal in Canada to support or promote genocide, as well as communicate statements other than in private conversation that willfully promote hatred against an identifiable group.

Ontario's attorney general declined to press criminal charges last year against Hossain, saying the Bangladeshi-Canadian was undergoing rehabilitation with an imam.

Bernie Farber, CEO of the Canadian Jewish Congress, thinks removing Hossain as a student was long overdue.

"This is something we believe should have happened a long time ago. It was the only real option that York had," he told The CJN.

"[This move] creates a safe environment for Jewish students and faculty at York. It sends a very clear message. While freedom of speech and academic freedoms are cherished values, there is a line drawn in the sand. Advocating the murder of a specific group of people terribly crosses that line."

IAW should be barred from campuses: professor

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Israeli Apartheid Week (IAW) should not be allowed on university campuses, says Helmut-Harry Loewen, a sociology professor at the University of Winnipeg.

Loewen believes IAW is an attempt to instigate "hatred towards the State of Israel" and "to vilify Israel..., an attempt to undermine the right of Israel to exist as a state in the Middle East."

Loewen, who has been active in monitoring hate speech on the Internet with the Canadian Anti-Racism Educational and Research Society, said in an interview that he was involved in the movement to end apartheid in South Africa, and it is an inappropriate term to use with regard to Israel.

"I was one of four Canadian delegates appointed by [then-Canadian prime minister] Brian Mulroney to emergency meetings at the United Nations special committee on apartheid. Apartheid is a crime against international law. We can't use this type of legal category to delegitimize the state of Israel."

Loewen, who is a Mennonite and the son of Russian immigrants, said he was pleased that there was no IAW at the University of Winnipeg, but was unhappy about its taking place this year at the University of Manitoba. He added that other colleagues have similar opinions.

"By vilifying and promoting hatred toward Israel, IAW only serves to propel anti-Semitism on campuses," he said, adding that IAW is not a productive way to educate students about the complex issues in the Middle East conflict.

Loewen has been a longtime opponent of anti-Semitic hate speech. He was one of a number of complainants to the Canadian Human Rights Commission (CHRC) who spoke out against a hate telephone hotline of the Ku Klux Klan in 1993 that included the sale of "Klan Buster T-Shirts."

He gave testimony before the commission, which found the KKK to have violated Section 13 of the Canadian Human Rights Act. At the time, Loewen was chairing the Manitoba Coalition Against Racism and Apartheid.

Section 13 empowers the CHRC to deal with complaints regarding the communication of hate messages by telephone or on the Internet.

Loewen said this section "has been successful in terminating the most egregious type of hatred on the web" and ought to not be changed.

"I am an advocate of provisions that deal with hate speech both in the Criminal Code and under Section 13 of the Canadian Human Rights legislation.

"There is, unfortunately, a concerted effort from a number of sources to whittle away these provisions," he said, adding that he vehemently disagrees with opponents of this type of legislation.

Over the years, Loewen said he has "consulted and advised Winnipeg city police on laying hate crimes charges," noting that "police must be vigilant in pursuing these kinds of cases."

Regarding the spread of hate over the Internet, Loewen mentioned stopracism.ca, a website that monitors and tracks hate group activity, helps young people leave hate groups, and provides information and advice on filing complaints to stop hate-motivated activity anywhere.

In 1997, Loewen worked with the young leaders of United Against Racism, a Winnipeg-based group, to organize anti-racist rallies in Old Market Square in downtown Winnipeg, an area that has historically been the site of racist activity. In 1934, Jewish anti-Fascists rioted in Old Market Square and confronted members of the pro-Nazi Canadian Nationalist Party, who were marching in uniform.

"In 1997, we created a Nazi-free space," Loewen recalled. "We organized a rally at Old Market Square to commemorate the struggles of the Jewish Anti-Fascist League. It was a symbolic attempt to unite the older generation with younger anti-racist activists... Opposing anti-Semitism is an ongoing task."

Crosses mark Jewish cemetery in Ukraine

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

It seemed the meeting went quite well.

At the end of his presentation on preserving a Jewish cemetery in Sambir, Ukraine, Meylakh Sheykhet received a standing ovation from the estimated 200 guests present at a Ukrainian cultural gallery. Both the president of the Ukrainian Canadian Congress and religious dignitaries applauded his presentation.

Sheykhet, who was visiting Toronto from his home in Lviv, Ukraine, believes his message resonated with the assembled guests.

"I said we should do something together to cement our efforts for countryhood and statehood within which our history was one of the nicest parts of the Jewish Diaspora and which was an example to the gentiles," he said.

Specifically, Sheykhet is hoping local Ukrainian leaders, who are held in high regard in Ukraine, will call upon their compatriots there to right a wrong that has been festering for close to 10 years – the removal of three crosses that stand over the Jewish cemetery in Sambir.

Sheykhet, a former IT lecturer who's made it his life's work to preserve Jewish sites in Ukraine, has been actively embroiled in a dispute with municipal authorities in the western Ukraine city of Sambir, where three 10-metre metal crosses have been placed in a historic Jewish cemetery. Despite apparent sympathy from national and regional governments, nothing has been done to remove the Christian symbols, which were erected by local ultra-nationalists.

As the story goes, following the collapse of communism and the establishment of an independent Ukraine, a Jewish philanthropist from Victoria, B.C., Jack Gardner, who hailed from Sambir, received permission to rehabilitate several formerly Jewish sites, including the cemetery in Sambir.

The grave site had been used by the Jewish community for centuries. In 1941, just prior to the Nazi invasion, Sambir was home to about 10,000 Jews – half the city's population. Several "actions" destroyed the community. In one, on the first day of Pesach 1943, some 2,000 Jews were rounded up and taken to the cemetery, where they were shot and buried.

Mark Freiman, president of Canadian Jewish Congress, said he lost about 100 relatives – grandparents, aunts, uncles and cousins – during the war. His parents were two of only 100 Jews from Sambir who survived.

After the 1973 Yom Kippur War, in anger at the Israeli military victory, the Soviet government bulldozed the cemetery, removed headstones (some were used in the walls of a candy factory) and turned it into a public park. Actually, it was more of an open field where local farmers grazed their animals or used it as a garbage dump, Freiman, who visited the site in 2007, said.

Sheykhet, who headed local efforts to reclaim the cemetery, said every time steps are taken to mark the site, such as putting up a surrounding fence, "local people came and took it in the middle of the night."

In 2001, after a stone Star of David was placed on the property, vandals tore it up and erected three crosses, which were then painted to look like birch trees, Freiman said.

The national and regional governments say the municipal government has jurisdiction, but it has done nothing to resolve the issue. The Ukrainian judicial system "has been entirely unhelpful and came out with decisions that defy legal rationale. It makes no sense at all," Freiman said, noting a supreme courtw decision ruled that since the cemetery was bulldozed, it lost its status as a cemetery and therefore is not protected as such under the law.

Freiman, a lawyer and former deputy attorney-general of Ontario, noted that Canadians through the Canadian International Development Agency have supported a program of legal education in Ukraine.

Sheykhet said he hopes his message emphasizing the Jewish people's integral role in Ukrainian history and their mutual suffering at the hands of the Communists will prevail upon local Ukrainians to take up their cause with the government of Ukraine.

עברית קשה שפה

פרופ. אהובה שולמן , מרכזת לימודי העברית באוניברסיטת ירדן, מגיבה על "עברית קשה שפה" הראשון:

" קיוויתי את המדור האחרון שלך ובוצעתי להעיר שתי הערות לגבי מה שכתבת על השפה העברית.

לגבי "הדיקי", בנין שזאת נטעת לומר הודיקן (שפרדשה 'השפו ידקים'), אך הצורה הנכונה מאותו שורש (ר"ק) היא 'הֲרִיקִי'. הצורה הוקנו היא צורת משנה שהתפתחה מאוחר יותר משם התואר "רֵיקָן" (שורש רק"ן). כך שהצורה שהצעת אינה הצורה התלמודית היחידה.

לגבי המילה אומן. אתה מבחין בין אומן לאמן ומציין שהחבדל ביניהן הוא הכתיב בי"ו במילה אומן (כשמדובר בבעל-מלאכה), לעומת הכתיב ללא ו"ו כשמדובר באָמָן (ששסק באומנות כגון ציור, ומוזיקה). מדבריך לא ברור לקורא ההבדל המשמעותי יותר שהוא ההבדל בהגייה (U לעומת O): אָמָן (umman) - בעל מלאכה, אדם העוסק במקצוע הכרוך במלאכת כפיים, לעומת אָמָן (omman) – עוסק באָמָנות (ommanut) כגון ציור ופיסול. מדבריך ניתן להבין שיש להגות את המילה אָמָן כ- amman וזאת אינה הגייה נכונה (הקמץ בארת א' הוא קמץ קטן ויש להגות אותו O כגון במילה אָבָּנט למשל). בכתיב חסר-הניקוד נהגים לכתוב ו"ו בשתי הצורות: אומן (בעל מלאכה) ואומן - אדם העוסק באומנות (כגון ציור ופיסול)."

תגיד לאמא שלך
שאני מוסרת שלום,
תבל שהיא גידלה אותך
באופן כל כך אידום."

אבל שישאר בינתיים.

מה יהיה

לפני שבועיים כתבתי כאן דברים קשים על תפקוד ממשלת ישראל. בין השאר אמרתי:

"במשאל שערכה מדינה צמח השבוע אמרי רוב הישראלים שממשלת נתניהו אינה מייצגת אותם. סליחה חברים-פעות בידכם-היא מייצגת אתכם כיאות- ככה הצבעתם בבחירות. ... אין לבוא ולו בטענה קטנה לנתניהו ולליברמן-הם עושים בדיוק את מה שהם הבטיחו לבוחריהם, או כמו שהיטיב לומר זאת השר סילבן שלום:"מה חשבו, שבחרנו לבצע את המצע של קדימה?"

מספר חברים שדאגו לשלומי דחוני לי על "תגובת קשות" לדברים שכתבתי. אם חשב מי מיכם שאלה הן דיעות קיצוניות, הינה מבחר קצר מדברים בשם אומרם מן העיתונות הישראלית:

אריק בנדר (מעריב): "מי לעזאזל מנהל את המדינה הזאת? ...איך זה קורה לנו שהמדינה שלנו מתנהלת כמו ועד של קהילה בגליציה?"

בני ליי (ידיעות אחרונות): "בשל התעקשותו לרשום רווח קטן בסעיף "ירושלים", רושם ראש הממשלה עכשיו הפסדי ענק בסעיף :ישראל".

האם הייתי כותב דברים כאלה גם באנגלית? כמובן שלא. הסדר הזה, כמו כן הוא "שישאר בינתיים" הוא מור בעברית, לישראלים, ומה שכתבתי פה זה מה שרובכם אומרים בשיחות סלון של ימי ששי. ושישאר בינתיים.

NY Times columnist contradicts himself

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

In the aftermath of 9/11, when it was fashionable in many circles to link Muslim "outrage" over Israel and U.S. Mideast policy to these horrific attacks, New York Times columnist Thomas Friedman would have none of it. In a series of pieces, Friedman argued that the Arab and Muslim worlds needed to stop blaming others and instead look honestly and critically at their own failures to provide freedom, economic opportunity and hope to their people.

In his Mar. 31, 2002 column, "Suicidal Lies," Friedman criticized then-Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat for refusing to show any interest in Palestinian state-building and for walking away from former U.S. president Bill Clinton's peace plan for the creation of this state. Instead, Arafat was busy attacking Israeli civilians with wave after wave of suicide bombers. Friedman insisted that Israel's defeat of these attacks was "vital to the security of every American, and indeed... to all of civilization." His point was that if this form of terrorism succeeds in Israel, other countries – including the United States – would be at greater risk for the same. "That is why," Friedman wrote, "the whole world must see this Palestinian suicide strategy defeated."

Now, however, even Friedman himself appears to have forgotten what he wrote just a few short years ago. He's joined the more traditional "linkage" crowd, and in a way that is, frankly, shocking in its superficiality.

Linkage argument faulty

In his March 28 New York Times piece, "Hobby or Necessity," Friedman maintained that with large numbers of U.S. troops fighting wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, they are "more in need than ever of Muslim goodwill to protect themselves and defeat Muslim extremists," and that an essential way to achieve this is to secure "Israeli-Palestinian peace," with the onus on Israel.

Linking Israel in this way to broader American fortunes in the region has, for many, a widespread surface appeal, but it's spurious.

While no one would argue that the goal of peace between Israelis and Palestinians isn't important, even vital, this is so for the sake of Israelis and Palestinians themselves. It's not because peace is going to assuage extremists (who in any event demand that Israel be destroyed) or even provide "Muslim goodwill" for the protection of U.S. troops.

Friedman bolstered his argument as follows: "Both [U.S.] Vice-President Joe Biden and Gen. David Petraeus have been quoted recently as saying that the festering Israeli-Palestinian conflict foments anti-U.S. sentiments, because of the perception that America usually sides with Israel, and these sentiments are exploited by Al Qaeda, Hamas, Hezbollah and Iran to generate anti-Americanism that complicates life for our soldiers in the region. I wouldn't exaggerate this, but I would not dismiss it either."

What Friedman did not say, however, is that both Biden and Petraeus have denied making this linkage. (Jeffrey Goldberg accurately explained Biden's position back on March 16 in the Atlantic, and Max Boot did the same regarding Petraeus' position in his March 18 blog for Commentary.)

On March 25, the Jerusalem Post reported that Petraeus called IDF Chief of Staff Lt.-Gen. Gabi Ashkenazi to assure him that comments attributed to him – that Israeli intransigence was a problem for the U.S. military and was fomenting conflict – were not true.

Yet, fully three days later, Friedman referred only to Biden and Petraeus having been "widely quoted" saying, in effect, that Israel's behaviour is putting the lives of U.S. soldiers at risk.

In his April 1 Jerusalem Post blog, Alan Dershowitz tore into this "linkage" argument at length, calling it "entirely false," and "dangerous." "There is," he wrote, "absolutely no correlation between Israeli actions and the safety of American troops – none."

Dershowitz pointed out (as have others) that Islamists attack U.S. troops because of their presence in Iraq and Afghanistan (even, more broadly, because of what the United States stands for), not because of Israel, although Israel is for sure always a convenient excuse.

But what an influential columnist such as Friedman needs to rely on are not convenient excuses and myths, but careful, accurate analysis – plus, one might hope, some memory of what he himself has written in the past.

Radio McGill raps Palestinian show

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — McGill University's radio station has found fault with a Palestinian community program that it carries for a report alleging Israeli involvement in the abuse of prisoners at the U.S.-run Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq.

Responding to a complaint filed by HonestReporting Canada, a pro-Israel media monitoring group, Radio CKUT 90.3FM issued a warning letter to Under the Olive Tree and told it to make an on-air retraction and clarification about the report, which aired Jan. 21.

HonestReporting charged that the report was not only "outrageous and unsubstantiated," but that its true source wasn't revealed.

On Jan. 21, the host of the show read a two-minute report that he said was from the Lebanese newspaper Al-Akhbar, quoting the commander of the prison, now retired U.S. Col. Janis Karpinski, who was demoted for her role in the scandal, as having broken her silence on the matter.

She is alleged to have said Israeli agents were recruited by the U.S. military as interrogators and that was one of the reasons torture and abuse were rampant at Abu Ghraib.

HonestReporting's executive director, Mike Fegelman, maintains that the true source was Press TV, Iran's state media. Press TV did, in fact, disseminate a similar story on Jan. 20 on the Internet, citing Al-Akhbar.

After an investigation, CKUT's programming committee responded to HonestReporting March 23 that it agreed that the host "did not properly cite the source of the article that was read on air" and that the report was ambiguous about where and when Karpinski made the alleged comments. When questioned by the committee, the Under the Olive Tree host was unable to provide the source of the quotation.

CKUT told the show to retract "statements made regarding… Karpinski and that Israeli involvement [led] to increased sexual and physical violence in Abu Ghraib."

It also had to "explain to CKUT listeners that Press TV was the source" of the article.

Fegelman is pleased with the reprimand, but he feels Under the Olive Tree has not fulfilled the spirit of CKUT's order. He described the clarification that was made March 25 as "one of the most disingenuous and obfuscating 'clarifications' that we have ever heard."

The host did state that the source was Press TV and provided its website address – twice.

Concerning Karpinski, he said that "she did not state explicitly that Israeli involvement in the Abu Ghraib prison is what resulted directly in the increased sexual and physical violence."

Fegelman points out that he did not retract the original claim of Israeli involvement and essentially provided an advertisement for Press TV, inviting listeners to check it out.

Fegelman called Press TV an "anti-Semitic propaganda tool" and that "in insinuating that Israel was responsible for the physical torture and sexual abuse of Iraqi prisoners at Abu Ghraib, this program spewed a vicious libel against Israel and deserved to be strongly condemned."

Fegelman is also irked that the host's reference to the "hundreds" of e-mails the program received about the report implied that the response was positive, when, in fact, many of them came from HonestReporting's members.

He said that Under the Olive Tree should have made an unequivocal statement like the CBC News show The National did in 2004 that "there is no evidence that Israel was involved in what happened in the Iraqi prison."

Nevertheless, Fegelman said the show "now has a documented anti-Israel track record with its host station."

Under the Olive Tree should now be more careful knowing that listeners are vigilantly monitoring what they're saying and are prepared to take action," he said.

Political parties call for government action

Both the provincial Progressive Conservative party and the federal Liberals released statements condemning the attacks.

"As recent events such as Israeli Apartheid Week remind us, there is a disturbing market for anti-Semitic activists and their rhetoric at too many Ontario universities," Ontario PC leader Tim Hudak said.

"For these activists, religious bigotry is acceptable as long as it is directed at people of the Jewish faith. It is sad, but not surprising, that this double standard in human rights is now prompting acts of violence."

MP Justin Trudeau, youth and multiculturalism critic for the federal Liberals, said the attacks should remind Canadians to remain vigilant against all forms of hatred, prejudice and intolerance.

Farber said he hopes the attack was a "one-off" event, but Kochman said it's scary for other pro-Israel student leaders and activists.

"If these students can be targeted, why can't I be?" he asked.

Despite the attacks, Bergamini said his support for Israel hasn't wavered.

"If anything, my beliefs are more firm now," he said.

He said he recognizes that not every person who is against Israel would act like this, but it shows what some people are capable of doing when fuelled by anger.

"I hope that people just realize the hatred that exists and take action against that," he said.

In related news, the Ottawa police hate crimes unit is investigating anti-Semitic graffiti found early last month in a men's washroom at Carleton.

Messages such as "Nuke Israel" and a swastika were found in a stall during Israeli Apartheid week, but police said messages such as "White power" suggest the graffiti was related to neo-Nazis, not the pro-Palestinian movement.

Carleton treated the matter as a hate crime and called police, who have no suspects and say such crimes are hard to solve without witnesses, Canwest News reported.

Clarification

The story "Hydro-Quebec postpones seder night power cut" (April 8) reported that power would be cut by Hydro-Quebec on April 5 from 11:30 p.m. until 4:30 a.m. the next day in the Outremont area. In fact, the electricity was off one day later during the same hours. The load-shedding had originally been scheduled for March 29 at the same time, but the utility responded to complaints from the Jewish community that it would disrupt the first seder. The power was finally cut after Passover concluded on the evening of April 6 .

Oakville bar mitzvah boy camps out for Haiti

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Stephen Wise, spiritual leader of Shaarei Beth-El Congregation in Oakville, Ont., says that Tommy Tencer's recent bar mitzvah project is "one of the most selfless and inspiring" ones he has ever encountered.

The 13-year-old competitive trampolinist braved windy, rainy and cold weather to spend 24 hours camping outside the synagogue last month to raise money for earthquake victims in Haiti. As well, he donated half his monetary gifts for a combined total of about $2,000.

The project was his own idea.

"I had just heard about the earthquake, and how everyone was sleeping outside in tents," he told The CJN in a phone interview.

Tommy Tencer camped out for 24 hours outside Shaarei Beth-El Congregation to help earthquake victims in Haiti.

The news reports prompted him to ask Rabbi Wise about helping out as part of his bar mitzvah project.

As well, Tommy, who likes canoeing and archery at summer camp, said, "a lot of my [bar mitzvah] speech is about trying to get inside other people's heads and see what they're thinking about."

His father Ken, who slept on a couch in the synagogue lobby overnight, said that Tommy had a lot of visitors during his stay in the tent from March 13 to 14. Some of them had read about him in a local newspaper and came to give him hot chocolate, donations for Haiti, and moral support.

Ken described his son – the middle child of three – as a good student who is "very high-energy, very outgoing, with a lot of passion for the things he does with school or athletics or causes."

Among his previous efforts, Tommy took part in Hoops for Heart, a fundraising basketball program, with his school last year.

To pass the time when he was alone in the tent, he read books, drew pictures and listened to music.

"It was fun when people stopped by," he said. Some had blankets or tents destined for the synagogue's "Containers of Hope for Haiti" project.

Canadians, Europeans to mark San Remo conference

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Do a Google search of the phrase "illegal occupation," and you'll invariably find the top results link Israel to the term.

Repeated ad infinitum, it has become part of the public discourse on the Middle East conflict and the merits of the dispute between Jews and Palestinians.

But is it accurate?

Not according to a group of supporters of the Jewish state who will be gathering in San Remo, Italy, later this month to drive home the point that all the territory west of the Jordan River rightfully and legally belongs to the State of Israel.

On April 24 and 25, a handful of Canadians will meet with dozens of European colleagues to mark the 90th anniversary of the San Remo Conference.

They'll gather at the Institute for Humanitarian Law where the Allied Supreme Council (Britain, France, Italy and Japan) signed the documents that disposed of the former Ottoman (Turkish) territories by creating the legal basis for a number of new states, including Iraq, Syria, Lebanon and, eventually, Israel.

Salomon Benzimra, a semi-retired chemical engineer and amateur historian, said the San Remo Conference is "the source of the legal rights for Israel."

Benzimra, who has been studying the legal issues connected to the Mideast conflict for 10 years, said the documents signed at San Remo were eventually adopted by the League of Nations and formed the legal basis for the State of Israel, which was created in May 1948.

The resolution incorporated the wording of the Balfour Declaration and, in effect, recognized the ancient right of the Jewish people to all of Palestine, then merely a geographical region within the Ottoman Empire.

> 90th anniversary of gathering that conferred rights to Jews to land of Israel

Contrary to received opinion, which influences large numbers of people, "Israel is not a colonizing power, an imperial power that came and stole the land," he said. "You hear that at Israeli Apartheid Week and in the Guardian and Independent [British] newspapers and sometimes in the New York Times. It's become a received truth that Jews and Israelis are interlopers who came from nowhere and stole the land of Palestine. That's a major distortion of reality.

"The reality is that the Jewish people after 1,800 years of exile recovered the nation that was their ancestral land, not by stealth but by international law. International documents establish the legal rights of the Jewish people to reconstitute their nation in Israel based on a historical connection. 'Reconstituted,' not 'created,'" he added.

Benzimra believes that for the peace process to move beyond stalemate, the justice of the Jews' claim has to be recognized, not ignored.

Goldi Steiner will be one of the Canadians traveling to Italy later this month to attend the conference. She will address the gathering as founder and spokesperson for Canadian Supporters of Israel's Legal Rights (CASILER), an ad hoc coalition of like-minded people.

The group was founded last fall by Benzimra, the late Israel Kaplan and Steiner to counter "the heavy weight of lies by Muslims who say this land belongs to them."

The Canadian public is largely unaware of the historical merits of the Jewish people's legal claim to the territory, that "it's founded according to international law and not in violation of international law," Steiner said.

Joining Steiner and Benzimra at the conference will be lawyer Jacques Gauthier, whose 1,100-page thesis asserts the Jewish people's legal rights to the land west of the Jordan river.

The 90th anniversary commemoration is being sponsored by the European Coalition for Israel, CASILER, the City of San Remo and the International Institute of Humanitarian Law.

The program on April 24 will feature an international seminar on "the legal significance of the San Remo resolution as it relates to the status of Israel and Jerusalem in international law," followed the next day by an official ceremony commemorating the 90th anniversary of the signing of the San Remo resolution.

Holocaust Remembrance Day in Israel

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

JERUSALEM — Israel fell silent on Monday morning as a two-minute-long siren wailed across the country to mark Holocaust Martyrs and Heroes Day.

When the siren sounded at 10 a.m., traffic came to a total standstill. Drivers stood next to their cars and pedestrians stopped walking, many of them standing at attention or with their heads bowed.

The siren opened the annual commemoration at Yad Vashem, Israel's state Holocaust memorial authority, in Jerusalem. Wreaths were laid at the foot of the memorial for the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising.

Knesset Speaker Reuven Rivlin, President Shimon Peres, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, Opposition Leader Tzipi Livni, Knesset members and Holocaust survivors participated in the ceremony.

On Sunday, the eve of Holocaust Remembrance Day, Netanyahu spoke at the state ceremony and called on the world "to confront Iran's exterminatory intentions and act resolutely to stop Iran from obtaining nuclear weapons.

"The historic failure of free societies to confront the Nazi beast was that they did not face it in time," Netanyahu said at Yad Vashem. "And today we are witness to the old hatred of Jews once again, fuelled by extremist Islamic authorities, led by Iran and its satellites."

Earlier in the ceremony, Peres said the world must not repeat its indifference at the face of new cries for the destruction of the Jewish People.

"Israel will never forget the two decrees which the Holocaust enforced – the firm demand to sustain an independent Jewish state, one that holds its security in its own hands, while at the same time, tirelessly seeking peace as well as the demand to treat threats of annihilation, Holocaust denials and terror-mongering with the utmost severity," Peres said.

Also referring to the defence of the Jewish People in light of the lessons learned by the Holocaust, Israel Defence Forces chief Gabi Ashkenazi said earlier Sunday that never again would the Jewish People lack the means to defend themselves.

Speaking at the Yad Vashem memorial, Ashkenazi said the Jewish People "will never again be dependent on the benevolence of others. Never again will Jewish children be fearful or begging for mercy. Never again will an advocate of evil be able to dictate the future of the Jewish people.

"In the name of my father and his family, who fought for a sovereign and independent state, and in the name of the millions who were unable to witness the realization of their dream, I stand here today as the commander of the Hebrew defence force, the Israel Defence Forces."

Ashkenazi talked about the experiences of his father, a Holocaust survivor from the Bulgarian city of Plovdiv.

"On the night of March 9, 1943, my father's family opened their door to find Bulgarian police ordering them to prepare to be deported from Bulgaria within a few hours," Ashkenazi said.

"Along with 6,000 other Jews, my father assembled in the yard of the school and recited the prayer Shema Yisrael. In the end, my father and the Jews of Plovdiv were not sent to the death camps. The cancellation of their deportation order arrived when they were already at the train station, a short time before they were supposed to depart."

Community mourns death of Polish president

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

The Canadian Jewish community has offered its condolences to Poles around the world on the recent death of Polish President Lech Kaczynski.

Kaczynski, his wife, First Lady Maria Kaczynska, and dozens on his leadership team perished in a plane crash near Smolensk, Russia, on Saturday, April 10.

Canadian Jewish Congress, B'nai Brith Canada and the Polish-Jewish Heritage Foundation of Canada released statements over the weekend, among others, expressing their sympathy and mourning the deaths.

Peter Jassem, chair of the Toronto chapter of the Polish-Jewish Heritage Foundation, recalled Kaczynski's devotion to repairing ties between Jews, Israel and Poland.

"He continued the political course that has now made Poland the closest ally of the Jewish state in Europe and its fervent supporter in the United Nations. He was the first postwar head of Poland to celebrate the start of Chanukah in a Polish synagogue together with Warsaw's Jewish community leaders and the first to light candles in the presidential palace on this important holiday that was once celebrated by one in every 10 Polish citizens," Jassem said.

Bernie Farber, Congress' CEO, remembered the president and first lady as "stalwarts in enhancing Polish-Jewish relations" both in Poland and internationally.

"We grieve at this difficult time with [Polish ambassador to Canada Zenon] Kosiniak-Kamysz and the Polish-Canadian community. We will strive to honour the memory of Lech Kaczynski and Maria Kaczynska by working to bring our two communities even closer together," he said.

Frank Dimant, executive vice-president of B'nai Brith Canada, said there were no words to "express our deep sadness at Poland's great loss," adding that Kaczynski and Kaczynska were "wonderful people who worked tirelessly to promote Polish-Jewish relations and played a crucial role in healing some of the old wounds between our two communities."

The Polish government declared this week one of national mourning. Memorial services were scheduled in synagogues in Warsaw and Krakow, and Jewish organizations and cultural centres cancelled their programs.

"In the face of an unimaginable tragedy we join the victims' families and the whole country in grief and sorrow," said Joachim Russek, director of the Judaica Foundation Center for Jewish Culture in Krakow.

Kaczynski was a staunch friend of Israel and actively supported Jewish causes in Poland. When he was the mayor of Warsaw, he played a key role in the decision to found a Museum of the History of Polish Jewry, currently under construction on land donated by the city, and he was the honorary patron of the annual Festival of Jewish Culture in Krakow.

On Monday, the annual Holocaust memorial at Auschwitz-Birkenau also honoured the late Polish president.

Organizers of the March of the Living – in which some 10,000 Jewish youths march more than a mile (1.6 kilometres) between the two parts of the former Nazi death camp – which took place on Yom Hashoah, used Monday's Holocaust remembrance program at Auschwitz to issue a tribute to the fallen Polish president and remembered all those killed in Saturday's crash.

Kaczynski was a staunch friend of Israel and actively supported Jewish causes in Poland

"While our program will go on in deference to the memories of the six million killed in Europe during the Holocaust, we are deeply saddened by this terrible loss to the Polish government and people," said Shmuel Rosenman, chairman of the organization.

Israeli President Shimon Peres expressed "pain, shock and distress" in a statement released Saturday.

"The bilateral ties between our two countries were strengthened during his presidency, distinguished by a spirit of friendship and warmth. The State of Israel bows its head, as it partakes in the deep sorrow of the Polish people on the occasion of their dreadful loss," Peres said.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said in a statement released Saturday evening: "We share in the profound grief of the Polish people over the loss of President Kaczynski, his wife and all of the members of the Polish delegation. I knew President Kaczynski as a Polish patriot, as a great friend of Israel and as a leader who was very active on behalf of his people and for advancing peace and prosperity in the world.

"We recently met in Warsaw, in January of this year, within the framework of the events commemorating 65 years since the liberation of the Auschwitz camp and International Holocaust Day. President Kaczynski led an important process for opening a new page in relations between the Polish and Jewish people and developed Polish-Israeli relations."

'Enormous progress' expected

On Sunday, Obama said that efforts by Al Qaeda to acquire atomic weapons posed the biggest threat to global security, and world leaders meeting this week must act with urgency to combat this danger.

Speaking on the eve of an unprecedented 47-nation summit in Washington, D.C., aimed at thwarting nuclear terrorism, Obama said he expected "enormous progress" at the conference toward the goal of locking down loose nuclear material worldwide.

"The central focus of this nuclear summit is the fact that the single biggest threat to U.S. security – both short-term, medium-term and long-term – would be the possibility of a terrorist organization obtaining a nuclear weapon," Obama told reporters.

"We know that organizations like Al Qaeda are in the process of trying to secure a nuclear weapon – a weapon of mass destruction that they have no compunction at using," Obama said.

Obama's goal at the two-day summit is to get nations to agree to secure vulnerable nuclear material within four years and to take specific steps to crack down on nuclear smuggling.

The U.S. president held a series of wide-ranging talks with foreign leaders on Sunday, including the prime ministers of nuclear-armed foes India and Pakistan. Kazakh President Nursultan Nazarbayev and South Africa's Jacob Zuma.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu cancelled his participation in the conference. Intelligence and Atomic Energy Minister Dan Meridor will take Netanyahu's place at the summit.

Despite Netanyahu's decision not to attend, a top U.S. official said Friday that the administration believes Israel's delegation to the security summit will be "robust."

"We obviously would like to have the prime minister, but the deputy prime minister will be leading the delegation, and it will be a robust Israeli delegation," U.S. National Security Adviser Gen. Jim Jones told reporters travelling on Air Force One. He also said that relationships between the U.S. and Israel are "ongoing, fine and continuous."

Officials in Jerusalem said Netanyahu cancelled the trip over fears that a group of Muslim states, led by Egypt and Turkey, would demand that Israel sign up to the international Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty (NPT).

A senior government official told Ha'aretz that Israel was "disappointed" with developments in the run-up to the conference.

"The nuclear security summit is supposed to be about dealing with the danger of nuclear terror," the official said. "Israel is a part of that effort and has responded positively to President Obama's invitation to the conference."

The official added: "But that said, in the last few days we have received reports about the intention of several participant states to depart from the issue of combating terrorism and instead misuse the event to goad Israel over the NPT."

One hundred eighty-nine countries, including all Arab states, are party to the NPT. Only Israel, India, Pakistan and North Korea are not.

Israel is widely believed to have nuclear weapons, but operates a policy of "nuclear ambiguity," never publicly confirming or denying their existence.

Many Muslim countries have voiced alarm at alleged nuclear programs in Israel and Iran, and have repeatedly called for an agreement to ban nuclear weapons from the region.

In late March in a closed-door session, the Arab League called for a Middle East free of nuclear weapons, and for a review of the 1970 NPT in order to create a definitive plan for eliminating nuclear weapons.

League members also called on the UN to declare the Middle East a nuclear weapons-free region.

Anti-Semitism on rise in Europe

By CNAAN LIPHSHIZ

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The worldwide increase in anti-Semitic attacks following Israel's 2009 incursion into Gaza hit the United Kingdom and France the hardest, compared to all other European countries, according to Tel Aviv University's watchdog on anti-Semitism.

In 2009, the United Kingdom saw 374 manifestations of violence against Jews, compared to 112 in 2008, according to the Stephen Roth Institute for the study of Contemporary Antisemitism and Racism. France was a distant second, with 195 violent attacks in 2009, compared to 50 in 2008.

The total number of anti-Semitic incidents worldwide, according to the institute, was a record number of 1,129 in 2009, compared to 559 in 2008. The institute recorded 566 incidents of vandalism, targeting Jewish property worldwide in 2009, constituting 49 per cent of all incidents.

Four per cent of incidents – or 41 instances – were armed assaults against Jews because of their religion, and 15 per cent were weaponless assaults. Arson accounted for three per cent, or 34 instances. Threats of violence against Jews and Jewish institutions accounted for 29 percent.

The institute's Haim Fireberg noted that Britain had a relatively high level of xenophobic attacks in general, not only anti-Semitic ones.

Race-linked offences in England and Wales jumped from 31,000 in 2003 to more than 38,000 five years later, according to a report released last month by the European Commission Against Racism and Intolerance, based on British government figures.

"If we are going to be honest, there is not a lot that the Jewish communities can do to end anti-Semitism," said Moshe Kantor, president of the European Jewish Congress, which cooperated with the university in compiling the report on 2009. "It is important to delineate and monitor so governments and institutions would be prompted to act."

The Stephen Roth institute recorded 138 violent attacks against Jews in 2009 in Canada and 116 in the United States, compared to 33 in Germany, 22 in Austria and 28 in Belgium.

U.S. criticizes PA

The Obama administration "strongly condemned" the naming of Palestinian streets after terrorists and rebuked Palestinian Authority figures for denying Jerusalem's Jewish heritage. "We are disturbed by comments of Palestinian Authority officials regarding reconstruction and refurbishing of Jewish sites in the Jewish quarter of Jerusalem's Old City," State Department spokesperson P.J. Crowley said. "Remarks by the Palestinian ministry of information denying Jewish heritage in and links to Jerusalem undermine the trust and confidence needed for substantive and productive Israeli-Palestinian negotiations. We also strongly condemn the glorification of terrorists honouring terrorists who have murdered innocent civilians either by official statements or by the dedication of public places hurts peace efforts and must end. We will continue to hold Palestinian leaders accountable for incitement." Two streets have been named for terrorists in recent weeks in Ramallah. The initiatives were launched by Hamas officials on the town council, but without opposition – and in at least the first case, the encouragement – of PA officials. Some mainstream Jewish groups, Republicans and a number of pro-Israel Democrats have said that the Obama administration has failed to condemn such actions, although it has made public its dispute with Israel over new building in eastern Jerusalem.

Trade deal enacted

A pioneering free-trade deal between Israel and a bloc of South American countries came into effect last week. Israel is the first country outside South America to sign such an agreement with Mercosur, a regional bloc that includes Argentina, Brazil, Paraguay and Uruguay and produces more than $3 trillion in combined GDP. With the deal, bilateral trade is expected to increase threefold in the next five years. The final approval for the agreement was announced by Brazilian President Luiz Inacio Lula da Silva on March 15 during his visit to Israel. Brazil is Israel's largest trade partner in Latin America. The new deal is expected to provide a special boost to trade in agriculture, education, science, medicine and space.

Organ trafficking ring arrested

Israeli police arrested six men from northern Israel accused of being involved in an organ trafficking ring. The suspects include a military brigadier general and two attorneys. The ring allegedly identified potential organ donors through advertisements promising up to $100,000 in exchange for their kidneys. Some were reportedly paid $10,000 and others nothing at all. The transplants took place in Ecuador, Azerbaijan and the Philippines under substandard medical supervision. Some of the donors still suffer from complications. Israel outlawed providing organ donors for financial rewards in 2008. All organ transplants are carried out through the National Transplant and Organ Donation Center.

Student bases a film on experiences at Camp Kadimah

Since the short film Bunked! takes place at night, the cast and crew filmed for five straight nights.

Jonathan Oore, left, was flown in from Halifax to play Johnny, a camp counsellor. Adam, a camper, is played by Corey Lof.

Carrie Skurka, played by Laurie Campbell, is one of the love interests in the film Bunked!

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

It took Orlee-Rose Strauss five nights to film her final project for Ryerson University's film program. She barely slept, the weather didn't co-operate and the camera broke down.

"Anything you could think of that could go wrong went wrong," said Strauss, who will be graduating from Ryerson this year. "We would start [filming] at around 6:30 to 7 p.m. and we would shoot until 7 a.m., until the sun came up... because the whole film took place at night."

Her final product, called Bunked!, is a movie loosely based on her experiences at Camp Kadimah, a Jewish summer camp in Halifax where she has worked for five summers.

"I had worked there last summer, I was talking with a friend of mine from camp... about how I had no idea what I would do [for my final project]. He said, 'You've got to do a movie about this. About camp.' It's very special to us," she said.

In the short film, which Strauss wrote and directed, a counsellor on night watch interferes with a camper's attempts to sneak out and meet a girl he likes.

"I started writing the script at the end of August and I wrote it over September," she said. "It's a very simple story, it's essentially two boy-meets-girl stories. To get to the heart of the story, I had to really develop these two main characters and find out why they were different from other males."

The story and script took several months to finish, and went through many rewrites.

"The script went through about 10 drafts. I have a very challenging group of friends at Ryerson," she said. "The story was a definite challenge."

So was the casting. While trying to find someone to play Johnny, a camp counsellor, Strauss decided to fly Jonathan Oore, a friend of hers, out from Halifax for the part.

Preproduction for Bunked! took about six or seven weeks, but the most difficult component was the actual filming, which took place at a camp in Fergus, Ont.

"We essentially had to drive about 70 people to and from this campsite... Just getting people there and feeding them and keeping them warm and happy for five days was an incredible challenge," she said, adding that some of the crew drove back to Toronto for school and then would spend the night filming in Fergus.

Strauss, who was inspired by the 1979 movie Meatballs, decided to make her film a comedy, which in itself presented a problem.

"Writing a script that's funny not only to you but to other people is a challenge. You want to get other people's opinions and figure out what your demographic is," she said. "I decided I wanted to do a comedy that... was more subtle, like Meatballs. I took inspiration from that in terms of my comedy."

Because her comedy is subtle, Strauss was careful when working with the actors.

"[I was] working with actors to try and have them understand the comedic timing and pacing of the piece," she said, adding that they improvised lines while filming. "Thankfully, my actors were fantastic. I did a lot of improv with them, and they were hilarious on their own."

For Strauss, it was crucial to get every detail just right in her movie, especially since it reflected her own experiences at camp.

"The challenge in trying to recreate this experience in my life is that I wanted to really do it justice, to portray the experiences I had at camp and really have those come off on screen," she said. "It was really important to me not only that the story was good but that people can get a sense of what [I loved] about camp... [Camp Kadimah] means so much to me."

Strauss went to Camp Kadimah as a camper from 2000 to 2003, then returned in 2005 as a staff member. This summer, she'll be acting as a section head for the camp.

While Bunked!'s story isn't a Jewish one, the setting reflects her culture.

"We have our fair share of Jewish-sounding names... then we have a little art direction, one of our campers wears an Israeli army shirt," she said. "We didn't want to hit people over the head with it. It's very subtle."

Her film, which is still in the editing process, is about 13 minutes long and will debut in Ryerson's film festival in May, although Strauss plans on entering it in several film festivals throughout North America.

While pitching her film to professors at Ryerson, Strauss won the Kodak Film Award, which came with $1,000, and the William F. White International Equipment Award, a grant for renting filming equipment.

Although Strauss loves filmmaking, she didn't originally apply to Ryerson's film program.

Or any film program.

Instead, she spent a year in Israel after high school, then applied to Ryerson's new-media program.

"I wasn't crazy about it. I had no idea what was going on in the program. I was very lost. I knew it wasn't quite right for me," she said.

A professor suggested she switch to film, and Strauss hasn't looked back since.

"[I like] everything. Pre-production, the process of telling the story... working with a group of talented and creative people to help actualize the story," she said. "It's the directorial process that I love the most. It's basically finding the heart of the story through the actors."

Iconic Jaffa orange as a symbol of nationalism

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

This year's edition of the Toronto Jewish Film Festival, the 18th, overflows with an abundance of fine movies.

A sampler follows:

Eyal Sivan's documentary, Jaffa, The Orange's Clockwork, is a thoughtful primer on the iconic Jaffa orange, an enduring symbol of both Israeli and Palestinian nationalism.

Through the medium of archival footage, paintings, posters, poetry, songs and interviews, Sivan reflects on the economic and ideological significance of the citrus industry in Palestine and Israel. Dominated at first by Palestinian Arabs, the industry attracted Jewish entrepreneurs and farmers. Thanks to partnerships between Arab and Jewish growers and exporters, it served as an example of Arab-Jewish co-operation at a time of rising political tensions.

For Zionism, the Jaffa orange – often described as a "golden apple" – symbolized the restoration of a neglected land, the growth of a self-contained Jewish economy during the British Mandate period, and Jewish idealism. After 1948, it was inextricably associated with Israeli statehood.

To Palestinians today, the Jaffa orange represents a land lost and a memory remembered. By no coincidence, the early national colours of the Palestinian movement were green and orange. One Palestine Liberation Organization poster showed a masked gunman crouching under an orange tree. Lately, the Jaffa orange has shown up in propaganda posters calling for an boycott of Israeli goods.

Contemplating the clash that pitted Jews against Arabs, Haim Gouri, the celebrated Israeli poet, muses that the Jaffa orange pumped up both sides. Zionists saw it as a source of pride in Jewish agricultural prowess, while Palestinians regarded it as a metaphor for "a world destroyed" during the first Arab-Israeli war.

The march of time and water shortages have diminished the importance of citrus in Israel's contemporary high-tech economy. But in the hearts of many Israelis and Palestinians, the Jaffa orange still burns brightly as an emblem of progress and accomplishment.

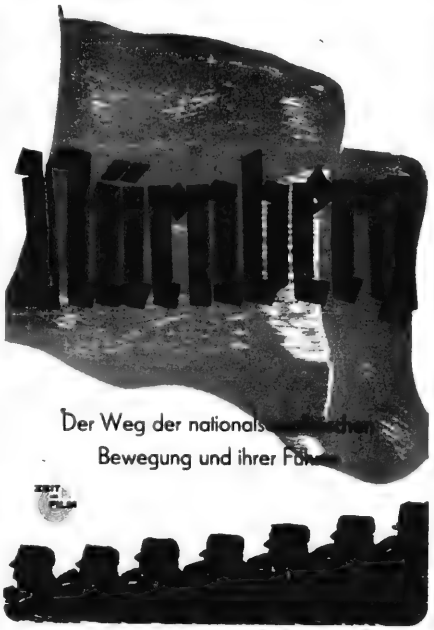
Commissioned by the U.S. military government in Germany and screened in German theatres in 1948 and 1949, Nuremberg: Its Lesson For Today was shelved and forgotten, much to the disappointment of its director and writer, Stuart Schulberg. His daughter, Sandra Schulberg, and her collaborator, Josh Waletzky, have restored this important and compelling documentary.

Narrated in a stentorian tone by the actor Liev Schreiber, the film is a historical account of Adolf Hitler's rise to power, Nazi aggression and war crimes in Europe and one of the greatest courtroom dramas in the annals of modern times. The black-and-white footage is stark and graphic. The first image of a bedraggled woman holding a baby as she emerges from a bomb shelter in a sea of urban rubble is telling.

Shifting to the postwar Nuremberg war-crimes tribunal, the movie pans on American prosecutor Robert Jackson. He declares that civilization cannot ignore Nazi atrocities and denounces Nazism as a toxic mixture of racial hatred and fierce nationalism.

Nuremberg, in some detail, describes Hitler's ideology, ascent and manipulation of public opinion, as well as Germany's rearmament program and territorial conquests before and after World War II. From the Rhineland and Poland to Norway and Holland, German armies ran roughshod over the continent.



The poster for the original German screening in 1948.

While Nuremberg exposes Germany's "criminal treatment" of Polish civilians and the murder of Europeans elsewhere, Jews, strangely enough, go unmentioned until nearly an hour into the film. After cataloguing the horrors of Nazi medical experiments, slave labour and the euthanasia program, it finally acknowledges that Jews were the object of Germany's "greatest crime against humanity." Gruesome clips of the death camps, the gas chambers and the Warsaw Ghetto uprising appear on screen.

The strongest segment unfolds as the Nazi criminals give voice to their feelings. Hermann Goring claims he did not know about the Holocaust, but admits that "excesses" took place. Walther Funk allows that "horrendous acts" were committed against Jews. Albert Speer speaks about the folly of following orders blindly. These mea culpas, of course, can't disguise the fact that Germany descended into hell during the Nazi interregnum.

The title of Lone Samaritan, a film about tradition and alienation by Barak Heymann, is a direct reference to Baruch Tzdaka. He is one of the last remaining followers of the Samaritans, a rapidly shrinking and reclusive religious sect that broke away from Judaism centuries ago and is now based in Holon, Israel, and Mount Gerizim, near the West Bank city of Nablus. The Lone Samaritan focuses on Baruch's daughter, Sophie, an Israeli singer and single mother who left the faith with her three sisters, resulting in his excommunication from this exotic community. Interestingly, however, Sophie would consider returning to the fold under the right conditions.

The Samaritans themselves are portrayed as narrow-minded people who consider apostates "garbage." The Samaritan high priest, a rabbinic-looking wizened old man in robes, comes across as utterly and irrevocably dogmatic.

Usually identified by their red fezzes, the Samaritans pray in synagogues that resemble mosques and gather on Mount Gerizim to slaughter sheep and bake them in smoky pits on High Holidays. Heymann's revealing documentary distils the essence of their lifestyle.

Etty Wieseltier's Achziv, A Place For Love turns on the Israeli eccentric Eli Avivi, a phlegmatic free spirit who established a bohemian retreat in an abandoned Arab village in northern Israel several decades ago. Israelis and foreigners who visited Achziv would usually partake of the forbidden fruits of nudity, free love and drugs. This funky film of Avivi's refuge transports a viewer to what is essentially another planet.

Honor (Kavod), directed by Haim Bouzaglo, is Israel's version of The Godfather. A moody, sporadically violent and entertaining feature film juxtaposing the sacred with the profane, it revolves around two Moroccan Israeli Mafia families that declare war on each other over a bitter dispute concerning a European casino. Thanks to a competent script, able direction and stellar performances, Honor acquits itself quite well.

Acclaimed flick about summer camp can't find a distributor

Coming-of-age comedy stuck in limbo

By JORDANA DIVON
Special to The CJN

Two years ago, Halifax-born filmmaker Jacob Medjuck released a film based on his childhood experiences at summer camp.

It wasn't just any camp movie, either. The film, called Summerhood, is narrated by actor John Cusack – currently starring in Hot Tub Time Machine and a helpful addition to any '80s youth nostalgia flick – and has played at dozens of festivals around the world to sold-out audiences.

Of the nine U.S. film festivals where Medjuck's film – his writing and directorial debut – has been screened, it has won prizes at seven. He was also personally invited by Pixar to screen the film for its artists, and he lectured Harvard University students on the business of filmmaking.

Yet you probably won't be reliving your camp days at a theatre near you anytime soon. Why? Because Summerhood can't get a distributor.

"To market a film costs $35 million, minimum," said Medjuck, a former CJN humour columnist, from his Vancouver home.

"These indie films – the ones you love – only cost a few million dollars to make, but they're only going to make about $20 million. So a studio isn't going to want to spend $35 million on a movie that's going to make less than that."

It's an unfortunate reality for filmmakers in tough economic times. Hard-hit studios simply aren't taking many chances on smaller films like Summerhood.

Of the 10 to 15 movies that Hollywood studios release per year, executives put a premium on how many dollars they'll get in return for their investment. And with a stable of big-name blockbusters at the gate, it's the rare independent feature that slips through.

"When the first four studios passed on buying us, I felt like, 'I'm not going to the prom. I'm not attractive,'" Medjuck said. "But when they passed on a Tom Hanks movie, I said, 'You know what? It's not my film. It's the industry.'"

Timing appears to be the only element not working in Summerhood's favour. Reviews have been mostly terrific for the film about four longtime friends on the cusp of puberty who realize at summer camp that they don't particularly like each other.

Struggles for social status, burgeoning puppy love and a sadistic camp director all compete for laughs in a story Medjuck said he wrote after years of working on "neutered portrayals of childhood" as a studio animator.

"The movies I was working on weren't true to the memories of my childhood," he said. "And although they were entertaining and wonderful, there was more value to what they weren't touching."

After stumbling upon a childhood diary, Medjuck recognized the potential to create a narrative that included the same rawness he expressed as a 10-year-old kid.

"There's a time when you have to move past the Munsters and get into the monsters," he said. "The world is full of trauma, and I just wanted to capture it in an honest way. To me, spin the bottle is traumatic. You put that bottle down and you think it's a good idea, but you know what? Fifty per cent of the time, you're kissing dudes."

Filmed over a three-month period at Nova Scotia's Camp Kadimah, Summerhood was a labour of love for Medjuck, who attended Camp Kadimah as a kid and served as the film's writer, director, producer, caterer and occasional background character.

He said he really bonded with the mostly Canadian cast and crew, and one of his biggest frustrations is that their families can't even see the film they worked on.

"You begin to understand why artists leave the country," he said.

There's still hope, however.

Medjuck has mounted an alternative marketing campaign using social media tools like Facebook, Twitter, YouTube and Eventful, where users can "demand" to bring Summerhood to their city by simply clicking a button.

He's also partnering with AMC Theatres to "get rid of the middle man" by running the Summerhood trailer before other films to garner interest (and put tushes in seats).

In the meantime, Medjuck has parlayed the buzz from Summerhood into two big budget animation feature projects from the producer who made Fox's Ice Age films.

While he won't have as much creative control as he did on Summerhood, Medjuck said the perks are worth it.

"For the value of not having to go door-to-door this time, I'm OK with sharing the workload."

You can learn more about Summerhood on the film's Facebook page, www.facebook.com/lazycamper, and view the trailer at www.summerhood.com.

Israeli rock star Berry Sakharof to play Toronto

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Berry Sakharof has been in the music industry for 25 years.

As an Israeli rock artist, he founded the band Minimal Compact, collaborated with bands like Infected Mushroom, has more than 30 albums out and has toured around the world.

And, for the first time in his rock career, he'll be coming to Canada.

"He's the legend of Israeli culture," said Ravid Dahan, owner of Motek Productions, an event-planning organization that brings Israeli artists to Canada. "All of the famous and successful artists in Israel are connected somehow to him."

Motek Productions, which plans some four concerts a year, tries to expose Canadian-born Jews to Israeli culture through different artists.

"The idea was to bring the top 10 [Israeli musicians], Berry's one of the top 10. He's never performed in Canada," Dahan said, adding that music is a good way to connect Canadians to Israel.

"It's really important to bring Israeli culture to North America, to be connected to Israel. It's not only being connected by donating money, it's to feel the country [through its music]. It's about what's going on in Israel," she said.

Sakharof, who was born in Turkey and immigrated to Israel as a child, started his rock career at 16, in the band Cosmic Dream. Along with friend and fellow musician Rami Fortis, Sakharof played in Israeli rock clubs.

After serving in the Israeli army, he moved to Brussels from 1980 to 1988. While living in Europe, Sakharof formed Minimal Compact, the first Israeli rock band to become successful outside of Israel.

"It's a totally different scene in Europe than in Israel. Professionally, I learned a lot," said Sakharof in a phone interview from Israel. "It was mainly learning. Israel is very small… I was very young at the time, before I went to Europe, I was more into Led Zeppelin, conservative rock. I think that I just learned how to develop more my own style."

His style includes Oriental melodies and a mixture of rock, electronic and dance music. His latest album, called Ibn Gabirol: Adumei Hasfatot, includes lyrics taken from the poetry of Solomon Ibn Gabirol, an 11th-century Jewish philosopher. The album incorporates older, traditional Jewish music.

"The last album I did, I met some people that are doing this kind of music… old music that [was passed] from father to son over the years in the Jewish community," he said.

"I really loved it… there were really nice texts, really nice construction with words. It opened to different kinds of music. Some of the things I did [on the album] was very old music… I always liked the rock and roll with a little bit of Oriental flavour."

Berry Sakharof

At his Toronto concert, Sakharof will be singing songs from his older albums, as well as his latest. While the musician has toured in Europe, Asia and the United States, he's yet to play in Canada.

"I don't really know [why]," he said, adding that he was supposed to play in Toronto in the past, but the details never worked out.

"I'm really waiting for [the Toronto concert]," he said.

Sakharof performs on April 20 at On The Rox Live, 1600 Steeles Ave. W. For tickets and information, visit www.motekproductions.com or call 647-899-0071.

Family tries to recover Nazi-looted art in Kacer's latest

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

Kathy Kacer, the award-winning author of several children's books about the Holocaust, including The Secret of Gabi's Dresser, has written a true story geared toward adults.

In Restitution, published by Second Story Press, the Toronto-based author, who is a child of Holocaust survivors, tells the story of the Reesers, a Czech-Canadian family who heroically faced down Nazis, Communists, prejudice and corruption for more than 50 years with the hopes of recovering four stolen paintings, lost after the family fled Nazi-occupied Czechoslovakia under the Gestapo's watchful eyes.

Kathy Kacer

Matriarch Marie Reeser and her son, Karl, never gave up their quest to reclaim what was rightfully theirs. In 1990, as communism was falling around them, Karl Reeser enlisted the help of two unlikely saviours – a daring Canadian diplomat and an "honest" Czech-Canadian art smuggler.

Reeser happens to be the father-in-law of Elizabeth Forster, a law partner of Kacer's husband, Ian Epstein.

"Ian is always promoting all of my books throughout the law firm. Elizabeth had a copy of my very first book, The Secret of Gabi's Dresser. That story is set in the former Czechoslovakia, and her father-in-law is from Czechoslovakia. I was absolutely riveted when I heard his story. It had everything to do with espionage and adventure," Kacer says.

"I knew almost immediately that I would love to write this book, but at the time, five or six years ago, I knew I wasn't ready yet to write an adult story, so I put it aside. Then about three years ago, I decided to do Karl's story," says Kacer.

Kacer said writing an adult book was both wonderful and challenging. "I find in writing adult stories, I don't have to edit my adult content. I can really write what is in my head.

"The process is different when writing for kids, when I do have to think more carefully about those elements. At the end of the day, it is all about writing a great story… it doesn't matter if you are a kid or an adult – that is what appeals and that is what I try to do," she says.

Kacer writes both fiction and non-fiction, but all of her stories are based on fact and many on real people. In the case of Reeser, Kacer met with the now octogenarian over a period of 2-1/2 years.

"We met in Karl's home, and for me it was having a sense of this story unfolding through Karl's eyes and through his memories," says Kacer, who saw the precious paintings.

"The paintings are beautiful, but more than just the paintings themselves is what they represent to this family, and that is really the essence of this story… one family's resilience in the aftermath of the World War II and their tenacity," Kacer said.

"I think Karl loved the process of meeting with me. What he loved most is the passages about his mother because she is such a heroic and courageous person… really stepping out of the shadow of even what was acceptable for women at that time. She's the one that took charge of the family and got them out [of Czechoslovakia] on the eve of the World War II. I think what Karl loved was a written account of his mother's heroic role in this family. The paintings are one legacy the family has, and this book is now part of that legacy."

Reeser's story is unique, Kacer says without giving too much of it away. It's unique because of the happy ending, since we know that most were not able to reclaim their property after the war.

Kacer, a former psychologist, has won many awards for her children's books, including the Yad Vashem Prize for Children's Holocaust Literature for Hiding Edith. Kacer travels around the world speaking to young people about the Holocaust.

She is the mother of two adult children, Gabi and Jake Epstein, both successful actor/singers. Kacer says she doesn't have another adult book planned in the near future, but she will not rule out the possibility of writing an interesting adult story that might come her way. Her next book will once again be written for children. In addition, she's at the beginning stages of writing an adult play about the Holocaust with her son.

Portuguese Jewish traders and merchants created commercial networks

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

During the 16th and 17th centuries, Portuguese merchants, mariners and migrants created one of the most extensive and powerful mercantile networks of the early modern period.

Collectively known as la Nacion portuguesa, they forged trading routes from Africa, South America, Asia and Europe, thereby building the foundations of a globalized economy.

A good many of these individuals were Sephardi Jews or Christians of Jewish origin who established Jewish communities in far-off lands, as we learn in Atlantic Diasporas: Jews, Conversos and Crypto-Jews in the Age of Mercantilism, 1500-1800 (Johns Hopkins University Press), a collection of erudite essays edited by Richard L. Kagan and Philip D. Morgan, both of whom are historians at Johns Hopkins University.

In the lead essay Jews and Crypto-Jews in the Atlantic World Systems, 1500-1800, Jonathan Israel, a professor of modern history at the Institute for Advanced Study in Princeton, N.J., says that Portuguese-speaking Jewish converts to Christianity based in Hamburg, Amsterdam and Livorno played a dominant role in the import of Brazilian sugar to Italy and northern Europe.

Crypto-Jews made their presence felt in Spanish America – Mexico City, Lima Veracruz, Guadalajara and Potosi – while Sephardi Jews set down roots in Curacao, Jamaica, Barbados, Saint Thomas and Suriname.

According to Israel, Sephardi and Converso networks were far less important to the commerce of the British empire and British North American ports.

In Jewish History in the Age of Atlanticism, Adam Sutcliffe, a historian at King's College in London, points out that the Sephardim possessed a "geographical reach" that no other trading diaspora could match.

Sutcliffe adds that Jews in 17th-century Dutch Brazil were dominant in the slave trade, a common colonial practice. And by engaging in sexual relations with their female slaves and fathering children with them, Jewish slaveholders reflected the prevalent norms of plantation behaviour.

Wim Klooster, in Networks of Colonial Entrepreneurs: The Founders of the Jewish Settlement in Dutch America, 1650s and 1660s, writes that northeastern Brazil was the first place in the western hemisphere where Jews were granted residential, commercial and religious rights.

Among the men and women who settled there were Jews from the Iberian peninsula. They arrived in Brazil via Amsterdam, says Klooster, a Clark University professor.

By the 17th century, the oldest overseas Portuguese community was composed of Jews, Conversos, New Christians and Catholics, states Daviken Studnicki-Gizbert of McGill University. They were subjected to anti-Semitism in pamphlets, plays, poetry and public processions, which accused la Nacion portuguesa of internationalism, materialism and atheism.

In Sephardi Merchants in the Early Modern Atlantic and Beyond, Francesca Trivellato of Yale University observes that Jews in Britain played a marginal role in British overseas trade due to their status as "aliens."

Bruno Feitler, in Jews and New Christians in Dutch Brazil, 1630-1654, says that Holland's short-lived occupation of the northeastern Brazilian coast prompted Jews in Amsterdam to migrate to the colony and establish the first official Jewish community in the New World in Recife.

These Jewish settlers formed strong relationships with local Christians, the descendants of Portuguese Jews who had been forced to convert to Catholicism. Influenced by their arrival, many local New Christians openly declared themselves to be Jews, says Feitler of the Federal University in Sao Paulo.

During the brief Dutch era, he notes, a Jew who returned to Judaism could attend synagogue without fear of persecution.

In A Matriarchal Matter: Slavery, Conversions and Upward Mobility in Suriname's Jewish Community, Aviva Ben-Ur of the University of Massachusetts deals with the issue of Jewish identity in a remote slave colony that drew its non-indigenous inhabitants from Africa, Europe, India, China and Indonesia.

As one of Suriname's first non-indigenous settlers, Jews prospered under tolerant British and Dutch rule.

By the mid-18th century, these Sephardi Jews had built Jodensavanne, an agrarian settlement in the jungle south of the capital city, Paramaribo.

Worked by African slaves, it had the distinction of being the largest Jewish agricultural community in the world and the only one in the Americas granted virtual self-rule.

Due to a number of reasons, including soil depletion and slave rebellions, Jodensavanne vanished, forcing most Jews to move to Paramaribo.

Since there was a shortage of women in the Jewish community, miscegenation was inevitable. As official marriages between freemen and slaves had no legal status, Jewish men took African wives in informal marriages. "African-origin women were thus a key component in the growth, survival and redefinition of the Sephardi population," says Ben-Ur.

Put another way, one out of 14 Sephardi Jews in Suriname from 1778 to 1835 was of African origin.

During this period, Suriname was home to the biggest Jewish community in the Americas. "Its Jewish community is the longest lived in South America, surviving until today," Ben-Ur writes.

Peter Mark and Jose Da Silva Horta focus on Africa in Catholics, Jews and Muslims in Early 17th-Century Guiné.

Sephardi Jewish traders and merchants who settled on Africa's west coast arrived by way of Amsterdam and were New Christians before returning to Judaism.

In Senegal, they were protected by local African Muslim rulers, say the authors, who respectively teach at Wesleyan University and Lisbon University. As in Suriname, Jewish men formed bonds with local women, preferably with the daughters of dignitaries or wealthy traders. Their offspring were fully accepted members of the Jewish community.

The final, summing up essay in this intriguing volume is by Natalie Zemon Davis, a professor emeritus at Princeton University and an adjunct professor at the University of Toronto.

She says that the entrepreneurial style of la Nacion portuguesa rested on an ability to cross borders easily, and that a shared Portuguese background contributed to the formation of trust – a vital ingredient in building a far-flung mercantile empire.

Israel & the Jewish World

Kyrgyz Jews hold breath amid upheaval

By ANNA RUDNITSKAYA and URIEL HEILMAN
JTA

MOSCOW — As the capital of Kyrgyzstan erupted in violence last week, members of the Central Asian nation's small Jewish community held their breath and sat tight.

The ORT school in the capital, Bishkek, shuttered its doors, sending students home just as they were returning from their Passover break. With public transportation suspended and the city in disarray, only three people made it to morning services at the local synagogue. Meanwhile, Jewish community leaders exchanged frantic phone calls, updating one another about the situation on the street.

By the end of the day last Wednesday, opposition protesters had stormed the presidential compound, overwhelmed the police and taken control of the government. The president, Kurmanbek Bakiev, had fled, and more than 40 people had been killed. Last Thursday, a former foreign minister announced he was leading a new, transitional government, which would last six months.

It was not immediately clear where this one-day revolution would leave the country – or its estimated 1,500 Jews, most of whom live in Bishkek.

"The situation is the city remains unstable, but the Jewish community has not suffered so far," Kyrgyzstan's chief rabbi, Arieh Reichman, told JTA. "All the community leaders keep in touch with each other and with the community members, mostly by phone. I have been contacted by an Israeli foundation that could provide us with humanitarian aid. But the situation is not as bad so far, and hopefully things will calm down in the near future."

More than half of Bishkek's Jews are on community welfare, receiving aid through the local Hesed centre, which is sponsored by the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee. Asher Ostrin, the executive director of JDC's operations in the former Soviet Union, said the community was working to ensure that its Jewish welfare clients experience no disruption during the unrest.

"When the rioting spread earlier in the week and then escalated into a full-scale revolution, we established immediate and ongoing contact with our sources in the community," Ostrin said in a dispatch to JDC officials. "There were no reported injuries among the Jewish population. Critically, we were told that services to elderly clients were not interrupted."

A security officer at the synagogue, Valentin Sharov, said the violence came close but did not reach the shul.

"A shop just 100 metres from us was ravaged last night, but no one tried to attack the synagogue," Sharov said last Thursday.

'There were no reported injuries among the Jewish population. Critically, we were told that services to elderly clients were not interrupted'

After shuttering early last Wednesday, all the city's Jewish institutions stayed closed last Thursday, reported Vladimir Katsman, director of Bishkek's ORT school.

"Yesterday we had to finish the lessons earlier than usual and to close the school until the situation gets more foreseeable. We even called the parents to come and take the children, because we were not sure the school bus that usually takes the children home could be safe enough," Katsman said. "Our ORT school is under surveillance. It became more difficult and expensive to keep the security men on duty these days, but we managed to solve the problem."

The Jews of Kyrgyzstan are comprised largely of the second- and third-generation descendants of Jews from Ukraine, Belarus and central Russia who fled here to escape the Nazis during World War II. Most returned home after the war, but enough remained to make an impression in Kyrgyzstan, where many of the Jews went into health care. Even during the era of Soviet state-sponsored anti-Semitism, there was little hostility toward Jews in this remote republic, local Jews said. When the country became independent after the collapse of the Soviet Union, Jewish security remained good. Though three-quarters of Kyrgyzstan's 5.5 million people are Muslim, radical Islam has not really gained a foothold in the country.

"We don't feel any problems because of the Islamic environment," Katsman said. "I haven't heard of any anti-Semitic utterances because of the street violence so far."

However, one journalist in the country told JTA about an encounter with a group of drunken young people demanding to know if the journalist was Jewish. The leader of the group made a disparaging remark about Jews.

The closest Israeli Embassy, in neighbouring Kazakhstan, said it was tracking events closely.

"We ask citizens of Israel who are in Kyrgyzstan to get in touch with us. This is a standard procedure in case of any trouble," an embassy official told JTA. "We do not have plans for an evacuation operation so far. We don't have information on the exact number of Israelis in Kyrgyzstan."

The ousted government, while widely considered repressive, was also pro-western, and the United States has a large air base in Kyrgyzstan that's critical to the NATO campaign in nearby Afghanistan. It's not clear whether the U.S. friendliness toward the former regime – which the opposition denounced and which U.S. observers described as a stance borne of pragmatism – will cost the West in its relationship with the new Kyrgyz government, which has close ties to Moscow. Opposition members who took control said they were interested in creating a government based on "justice and democracy."

Kyrgyzstan is bordered by three other former Soviet republics – Tajikistan, Uzbekistan and Kazakhstan – as well as China.

Extremes dominate Hungarian elections

JTA

BUDAPEST — The Hungarian and European Jewish communities reacted with shock to the first round of parliamentary elections, in which the extreme-Nationalist Jobbik party secured 26 seats.

The ultra-conservative Fidesz party and its ally the Christian People's Party took 206 seats in the 386-seat single-chamber parliament and is charged with forming a government by June. It's widely expected to be pushed further to the right by the openly anti-Semitic Jobbik.

The ruling Socialists suffered a humiliating defeat with only 28 seats left in parliament. A new moderate party called Politics Can Be Different won five seats. The Alliance of Free Democrats, that used to attract considerable Jewish support, has disappeared. The second round of the elections on April 25 may well intensify the trend of extremes set by the first.

Jewish community leaders in Hungary have described the election results as a disaster. The German business newspaper Handelsblatt expressed fears that nationalist tendencies in Hungarian politics may foster enmity with its neighbours within the European Union.

Jobbik's successes prove that "acceptable" anti-Semitism, xenophobia and racism are still alive and well in parts of Europe, according to a statement issued by the European Jewish Congress.

EJC president Moshe Kantor called the results a blow for tolerance in Europe. "This is an example of the political fragility of certain societies in Europe," Kantor said. "As a result of the economic crisis, certain extreme parties are able to deliver a scapegoat upon which to blame all their ills."

"This growing popularity of racist, xenophobic and anti-Semitic parties in Europe pose a grave danger to the fabric of Europe and could drag us back to the dark days of the past. We must act now," Kantor said.

The EJC, the democratically elected representative of European Jewish communities, is planning to lobby European governments to introduce greater democratic safeguards through legislation against the growing intolerance in Europe.

Peer still jubilant over performance in Dubai

By MARVIN GLASSMAN
Special to The CJN

MIAMI — Israeli tennis star Shahar Peer got as far as the third round of the recent Sony Ericsson Open in Miami before losing to Kim Clijsters, the eventual tournament winner.

Despite the loss, Peer was still jubilant – but it had more to do with her remarkable performance in Dubai more than a month ago.

She may have played the best tennis of her life in late February by finishing as a semifinalist at the Dubai tournament. Under heavy security, playing only on an outside court and restricted to her hotel and the tennis grounds, Peer nevertheless upset three seeded players, including top seed and the No. 2-ranked player in the world, Caroline Wozniacki of Denmark, 6-2, 7-5 before losing in the semifinals to Venus Williams 6-1, 6-4.

"I will remember this year's tournament at Dubai for the rest of my life. I proved to the world that sports and politics do not mix. I was proud of focusing on my tennis, beating three players ranked ahead of me," Peer said after her 51-minute, second-round victory over Alla Kudryavtseva of Russia 6-1, 6-0 in Miami.

Shahar Peer

Given the scrutiny in Dubai over the recent assassination of a Hamas leader near Peer's hotel, every precaution taken was necessary to ensure Peer's safety at the tournament.

"I can't imagine playing well under these circumstances. Shahar is courageous. I don't think anyone in tennis could have done what she did in Dubai," said Williams, who was a finalist at the Sony Ericsson Open.

Stacey Allaster, CEO of the Women's Tennis Association and former Rogers Cup Toronto tournament director, was impressed with the way tournament officials in Dubai handled Peer.

"The WTA and Shahar were pleased with how the security was handled. Despite the fact that Peer was never featured on centre court and many fans were inconvenienced, Shahar's life and security had to be protected," Allaster said.

Peer has become something of a celebrity to be admired beyond her achievements in tennis – at least in Israel and the worldwide Jewish community. She is in demand to be honoured whenever she travels to tournaments in places with large Jewish populations, such as Miami.

"Shahar had to turn down many more organizations in Miami and elsewhere that wanted to honour her since she was banned last year than she can accept," said her brother Shlomi, who manages Peer's schedule off the courts. Peer was honored in Miami at a reception for the South Florida region of the Maccabiah Games committee.

Only a year ago, Peer was a victim of Middle East politics when the United Arab Emirates refused to give her a visa to enter the 2009 Dubai tournament. But the move to ban Peer backfired: she received worldwide support from the biggest names in her sport, the tournament was fined $300,000 (US) and Peer was guaranteed entry into the Dubai tournament for the next five years.

Her rankings have risen dramatically after a precipitous drop in the immediate aftermath of the 2009 Dubai event. After dropping to 65th she rebounded during the latter half of the year, finishing deep in many tournaments, including a third round finish at the Rogers Cup in Toronto. Peer won two consecutive tournaments in late September and continued her consistent play in 2010 with many third-round and semifinal finishes, raising her ranking to 19th.

"I want to get better and improve. I knew that I could do well and still be in the top 30 and proved to myself that I can compete with the best players in tennis," said the 22-year-old Peer.

Fichman's ranking soars

Sharon Fichman of Toronto, whose aim in 2010 is to be ranked among the top 100 in women's tennis, saw her rankings rise more than 180 places from 302 to a current high of 121. Fichman had her best tournament in late February in Acapulco, Mexico, upsetting the world's 40th ranked player, Soroma Cirstea, of Romania 6-2, 6-0 and fourth seed Mariya Koryttseva of Ukraine 6-2, 6-3 en route to a quarter-final finish.

Fichman won Tennis Canada's Ace award as Canada's most improved player in 2009. With her high ranking, she will be allowed to enter the qualifying rounds of the major tournaments on the women's pro circuit. Fichman won two singles matches in Paraguay and led Canada to victory in Fed Cup Americas Zone competition in February to enhance her status as the third-ranked Canadian in tennis.

"I am pleased with my performance so far and hope to continue improving in 2010. I am playing aggressively with more confidence than ever before," said Fichman following her first round loss in qualifying at the Sony Ericsson Open to Russia's Regina Kulikova 6-0, 6-1.

Sharon Fichman

Barring injury, Fichman and Peer will be competing at the Roger's Cup tournament in Montreal from Aug. 14 to 22. For more information, visit www.tenniscanada.com

Out of the Cold program hosts art show

Compiled by CJN Staff

"What about these two colours, they rhyme, right?" Peter held up a turquoise and a fuchsia pastel crayon.

The instructor smiled and nodded at the complementary colours. Peter is a musician, and this was his first time creating visual art.

Peter is one of 150 guests who comes to Beth Sholom Synagogue's Out of the Cold weekly program, which has run for 11 winter seasons. The program offers guests a hot dinner, overnight shelter, breakfast, a bagged lunch and clothing donations.

This past winter, Tuesday evenings at Beth Sholom have also included an informal art program. Amid a room of diners and rowdy conversation, one of the round tables is cleared at 7 p.m. to become the designated art table. Paints and pastels are laid out, and guests and volunteers sit down together to share ideas and create artwork.

On April 18, from 2 to 4 p.m., Beth Sholom's Out of the Cold program will be hosting its first art show and fundraiser, "Into the Light." The artwork, created by the synagogue's guests, is for sale, with all proceeds going to the artists and back into the program.

For more information about the exhibit, call Beth Sholom Synagogue at 416-783-6103 or e-mail Melanie at intothelightshow@gmail.com.

A Family Business for over 60 Years

About Life

Dear Ella,

My sister Beth and I are in a very uncomfortable position. Jacob, our older brother has recently moved in with his latest conquest, who is 15 years his junior. He is head over heels in love with her, and she can get him to do whatever she wants. Jacob has never been very successful. He is a "get rich quick" kind of guy, trying all kinds of business ventures, none of which pan out. His new lady friend has very expensive tastes, and lately Jacob has been hounding our mother for money. He is always broke, yet drives an expensive car and seems to be lacking for nothing Mom feels sorry for him and has given him a substantial amount of money in the past, but she's feeling very used and has come to Beth and me for advice. I told her to just say no, but she loses sleep at night out of guilt. We could use some advice on how to handle this.

Pushed Too Far

Dear Pushed Too Far

Money issues and family are an old and sensitive problem for which there are no easy solutions. When it comes to money, it only takes one selfish, short-sighted family member to destroy the harmony of an otherwise loving family. The control is out of your hands. Jacob is going to do what he decides to do, and your mother can't help how she feels.

Unfortunately this problem is not unique. I'm going to assume that you and your sister have tried the obvious and have spoken to Jacob about the stress he is causing your mother.

But short of leaving the situation to fester, there is another suggestion: take the decision away from your mother, or at least make it seem that way

There are professional money managers who can take over Make an appointment with one of them and explain the situation. Your mother can empower this manager to be the "bad guy." Next time Jacob comes knocking, she can simply tell him to go speak to the accountant. Obviously, your mother would still have ultimate control over her finances, but the burden and guilt would now shift to the accountant.

Even a move like this is a huge change for your mother, but it may be the answer to solving this rift that is sure to divide you all if you don't take some kind of action.

Readers can submit their questions to Ella at The CJN, e-mail: ella@cjnews.com. But Ella is not a professional counsellor. She brings to the questions posed by readers her unique brand of earthy wisdom. Her advice is not a replacement for medical, legal or any other advice. For serious problems, consult a professional

Finding your bliss

Life Coach Corner

By JUDY SIBLIN-LIBRACH

A big part of finding your bliss is having the guts to make a giant leap in the area that you love and that gives you deep fulfilment. You also have to immerse yourself in the sphere that you want to enter.

For instance, you can't say you want to write a book and just think and dream about it. You have to commit to writing every day.

Last year, I was talking to a woman who mentioned that she loved this column and the concept of "finding your bliss." She asked me what my bliss was, in addition to my husband and our children. I answered, "Singing in a jazz club." She then asked me, "Oh, when's your next gig?" I was taken aback. Here I was dispensing advice to others on how to achieve their bliss and I wasn't following my own advice. I responded, "I'll let you know." I immediately got into motion.

First, I found out where there was an open mike night, stepped up my singing lessons and finally called the recording studio where I'd won a three-hour session and booked it. I started practising every day, did that first gig, and the more I entered into the sphere, the further I got along on my path of becoming a singer. I recorded some songs and was told that one in particular could actually be part of an album. When my wonderful husband wanted to make me a party to celebrate a special birthday, he asked, "What would make this birthday more palatable," and I answered, "Singing jazz."

My excellent singing teacher helped me put a fabulous jazz band together, and I kept practising in my car and at home, and took a performance singing class with a group of nine other talented women and learned so much from all of them.

My husband invited all of our closest family and friends to a jazz club, and we had an evening of sheer bliss. I sang a set of 10 songs and was followed by our daughter, who sang three songs with her powerful, belting voice. She hit it out of the ballpark, especially with her final number I'm Telling You I'm Not Going. This, of course, was my greatest bliss.

Before that night, when it came to my first open mike night, I didn't have the accompanist I know, didn't know what charts were – which I've since learned all about – and needless to say, it wasn't perfect. At the next gig, there were sound issues.

But it's all good, because each time you put yourself out there, you learn a little more and you figure out what you need to do the next time. And just because you find your bliss, doesn't mean it's going to be perfect right away. You're still going to have growing pains, obstacles and imperfections.

But through all of that, I experienced moments on that magical night, when I felt so transported by singing. I experienced sheer bliss.

Thank you to the people who helped make that special evening happen. You made a dream come true. The best part was that several people wrote to me after the party to say that I inspired them to find and follow their own bliss. That was the greatest gift of all.

Take a chance and make a leap toward finding your bliss. You won't regret it.

Birthday of the founder of modern Zionism

Theodor Herzl was born 150 years ago on May 2, 1860. In his 1975 biography of the Jewish leader, Amos Elon wrote: "Almost single-handedly, he built and sustained a movement which, within half a century, through a modern migration of outcasts and idealists, led to the establishment of the modern State of Israel. Herzl did not invent Zionism. Others had done that before him. He forged the instruments that would put Zionism into practice, for politics is the development of power. From nothing, he created first an illusion of that power and then the power itself, which would later make possible the return of the Jews to Palestine."

Canada gets failing grade on war criminals

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

An Israel-based Nazi hunter has given Canada a failing grade for its lack of effort to bring Nazi war criminals to justice in 2009.

Canada was lumped together with Estonia, Hungary, Lithuania, Ukraine and Australia, countries that received a mark of F-2 in the Simon Wiesenthal Center's Worldwide Investigation and Prosecution of Nazi War Criminals. That's down from a "D" in 2008, when the Wiesenthal Center criticized Canada for its "minimal effort... which failed to achieve any practical results."

Efraim Zuroff

The F-2 was awarded to those countries "whose efforts or lack thereof have resulted in complete failure... primarily due to the absence of political will to proceed."

"Pathetic is the only word for it," said Efraim Zuroff, who compiled the ninth annual version of the report. "Canada is obviously one of the world's great democracies with a great record in human rights, but on these issues it's almost completely failed in practical terms."

Since 1994, when Canada gave up on criminal prosecutions and turned to the denaturalization remedy, eight Canadian residents have lost their citizenship, "but not one single one has been deported. All are still in Canada or died in Canada," Zuroff said.

"I think there's no political will in Ottawa to bring this to a conclusion."

In a written response to CJN queries, Carole Saindon, a spokesperson for the Department of Justice, stated, "The government is committed to Canada's war crimes program that upholds the government's policy that Canada is not a safe haven for anyone involved or complicit in crimes against humanity, war crimes or genocide. The policy applies to all crimes, regardless of when or where they were committed. We only commence proceedings when there is sufficient evidence. The government will not hesitate to take appropriate action where justified by the facts and the available evidence."

Zuroff compared Canada's record to that of the United States, which earned an "A" in his report, along with Germany. Both Canada and the United States use a similar profile for alleged perpetrators, and both countries employ the same denaturalization remedy, he said. Yet in the United States, 107 Nazi war criminals have "been defeated in court, 75 or 76 stripped of their citizenship and 35 deported or extradited," he said.

The News in Brief

Human Bones Found

SYDNEY, N.S. — What are thought to be human bones found near a Sydney, N.S., Jewish cemetery don't appear to be from the graveyard's plots, the president of a local synagogue says. On April 5, a TV crew found eight small bones in a field next to the 100-year-old Hebrew Cemetery, in the same area where a boy also found bones on April 3. Samples, including a jawbone, were sent to Halifax for testing. Marty Chernin, president of Temple Sons of Israel, told the Cape Breton Post that caretakers examined all 300 graves in the still-active cemetery for signs of disturbance and found none. Police don't suspect foul play, but Joe Parish, an anthropology professor at Cape Breton University who examined the site for the provincial medical examiner, told the Truro Daily News the remains appear to be from a single body and to have been disturbed from their original site.

World

Suspect Arrested

LOS ANGELES — Police arrested a suspect in an October 2009 shooting of two worshippers at a North Hollywood shul. Christopher Littlejohn, 37, was arrested April 15 in connection with the shooting in the underground garage of Adat Yeshurun Valley Sephardic Synagogue. A lone gunman shot two men in the knees as they arrived for the early minyan. Police quickly ruled out hate or terror, but hinted about links to organized crime.

Bishop To Appeal

BERLIN — A Catholic bishop from a breakaway sect says he'll appeal his fine for Holocaust denial. Richard Williamson of the Society of Saint Pius X was found guilty April 16 of Holocaust denial by a German district court, which upheld a $22,473 fine imposed in 2009. The British bishop, who lives in London, was fined for an interview in Regensburg in late 2008 with Sweden's SVT broadcaster in which he called the murder of Jews in gas chambers in the Shoah "lies, lies, lies." He also denied Jews were murdered in gas chambers and insisted that not more than 300,000 Jews were killed in all. Shoah denial is illegal in Germany. Bishop Williamson is one of four bishops rehabilitated by Pope Benedict XVI last year in hopes of healing a rift between conservative and progressive Catholics.

Kiwi Embassy Opens

WELLINGTON — An Israeli Embassy opened April 19 in New Zealand for the first time since 2002. The event marked a new era in Kiwi-Israeli diplomacy after a meltdown in 2004 when two alleged Mossad agents were jailed for illegally obtaining a New Zealand passport. Wellington suspended high-level relations for a year before Israel apologized. Ambassador Shemi Tzur, 64, will present his credentials May 7. Israel's embassy in Australia had covered New Zealand since the previous envoy departed in 2002 after budget cuts. New Zealand Prime Minister John Key, son of a Jewish refugee from Austria, has family in Israel.

Teenage Girl Elected

LOS ANGELES — A 15-year-old Orthodox Jewish girl has become Los Angeles' youngest elected public representative. Rachel Lester was voted this month to the South Robertson Neighborhood Council, besting her opponent, a university-educated family man, by a lopsided 144-to-13 margin.

Goldstone Will Attend Grandson's Simchah

CAPE TOWN — Richard Goldstone will attend his grandson's upcoming bar mitzvah in South Africa, following an agreement with local Jewish groups.

The South African Jewish Board of Deputies brokered a deal between Goldstone and community groups angry with him for authoring a UN report on the Gaza war seen as grossly unfair to Israel. Under the deal, Jewish groups agreed not to protest the celebrations and Goldstone agreed to meet with Jewish communal leaders, Goldstone and the board said in an April 23 joint statement.

The meeting, to be hosted by the South African Zionist Federation, will discuss the Jewish community's reaction to the Goldstone report, which accused Israel and Hamas of war crimes and possible crimes against humanity.

The Board of Deputies said that it "respectfully requests, in light of the agreement reached, that all parties immediately desist all public activities on this matter so that the young man's bar mitzvah celebration can be returned to the privacy and dignity that it deserves."

Goldstone originally had planned to skip his grandson's bar mitzvah after the Zionist Federation threatened to protest Goldstone outside the synagogue.

McGuinty readies for first trade mission to Israel

'Israel punching far beyond its weight,' says premier

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

On his first trade mission and visit to Israel, Ontario Premier Dalton McGuinty won't be looking for milk and honey. Instead, he'll be looking for smart business investments for the province.

"Israel is punching far above its weight. There's something next to miraculous in terms of the dynamism and strength of its economy. It continued to grow during this recession. There is much there for us to learn," he told The CJN during an interview with members of the Jewish media last week at the Ontario Investment and Trade Centre.

On the five-day trip from May 23 to 27 – which will see the premier tour Jerusalem, Tel Aviv, Ramallah and Bethlehem – McGuinty and a group of 43 delegates representing 34 organizations from the Ontario's life sciences, universities and health sectors will seek out "focused investment opportunities," he said.

Names of the delegates and the groups they represent, as well as a specific itinerary, were unavailable prior to The CJN's deadline.

Asked what he hoped to achieve on his first-ever visit to Israel, McGuinty said he hasn't set "any financial targets" and referred to the trip as strictly an "introductory mission" and an opportunity to "build on the foundation that's already there" between the province and the Jewish state.

"I've never heard of anyone having been on a trade mission [to Israel] being anything less than very pleased with the reception that they've had or the opportunities that they've found," McGuinty said. "Seeing is believing."

According to the province's most recent statistics, in 2008 "two-way goods" trade between Ontario and Israel totalled almost $1.1 billion, up 86 per cent from 2004.

"I'm looking to accelerate" those numbers, he said.

McGuinty reminded reporters that in 2005, the province and Israel – via the Canada-Israel Industrial Research and Development Foundation – signed a "memorandum of understanding" on industrial and technological development co-operation.

Because of disabled veterans like Matan, there is an Israel for all of us.

Yom Ha'atzmaut is the time to celebrate Israel's independence. It is also a time to remember injured veterans whose lives were transformed as they continued the fight for Israel's freedom.

Matan Berman comes from a family of deeply dedicated Zionists. He wanted to join the most prestigious combat unit he could. His love of dogs led him to enlist in the IDF's canine unit, OKETZ, a special division of the paratroopers.

When the Second Intifada broke out in September 2000, Matan's unit was sent to the Gaza Strip. The area was filled with explosive devices and booby traps. His unit was working diligently at defusing the bombs when one exploded, wounding Matan severely and killing three members of his unit.

Matan's leg, which was previously injured during training, was now far worse. He was left in unrelenting pain. Matan also was plagued by terrible post traumatic stress disorder (PTSD) that went undiagnosed for years. He blamed himself for the loss of his three friends.

Matan was suffering horribly — psychologically and physically. His pain was so severe that he felt relieved when the decision was made to amputate his leg. Last year, the surgery took place and the years of agony were finally over. However the long road to learning how to function with a prosthetic leg and to overcome PTSD was just beginning.

It was then that Beit Halochem came into Matan's life.

He'd been receiving physiotherapy twice a week. Now, with great determination, he began swimming vigorously at Haifa's Beit Halochem. He started riding a hand bike and taking skiing lessons on the slopes of Mt. Hermon — a program that is fully funded by Beit Halochem Canada.

Every new skill acquired at Beit Halochem bolsters Matan's strength and courage. The friends he has made there — all wounded veterans like himself — have given him a bond of companionship and support he thought he'd lost forever.

Beit Halochem has opened up a new world of hope for Matan, a world in which he can, for the first time in so long, see a future for himself.

PLEASE ASSIST the more than 51,000 disabled war veterans and victims of terror, who turn to Beit Halochem to help them in their REHABILITATION.

The brooding eyes of a dreamer

From the editor's desk...

Above all else, Theodor Herzl was a dreamer. This one overriding characteristic emerges in all the famous portraits and photos of the man.

Whether it is the photo of him leaning on the balcony railing outside his hotel room in Basel, looking pensively toward the Rhine River, or the profiled portrait of the man that hung in the room in Tel Aviv behind David Ben-Gurion as he read the declaration of the Jewish state's independence, this one very clear aspect of dreaminess shines from his brooding eyes.

Indeed Herzl was often criticized for lacking the essential quality of practical know-how. His ideas were excessively in the realm of politics and public relations, and insufficiently in the realm of pragmatics, his critics said.

They may have been correct.

Some of his ideas, such as his ostensible willingness to opt for a proposal to settle Jews in Uganda, were muddled and not well thought out. His knowledge and background in Jewish history, tradition and faith were also lacking.

And yet, his coal-black eyes could see far. He predicted a dire future for the Jews of Europe.

His journalist's instincts could sharply focus upon the essence of the story unfolding before him. He was only one of a few, if not actually two (he and writer Emile Zola) to publicly decry the travesty of the persecution of falsely accused and convicted army officer Alfred Dreyfus.

His literary ability could turn a pedestrian phrase into a marcher's rallying cry. "If you will it, it will be no fairy tale."

It is very difficult for us to imagine today, as Israel struggles so determinedly to reclaim the lustre and the loftiness in the term "Zionism," the profound impact of Herzl's brief life.

The promise of universal progress from the Enlightenment and from rapid industrialization had proved emptier and emptier for the vast masses of humanity, and especially so for the vast masses of the Jews.

Herzl substituted hope for promise. He stopped lamenting over and apologizing for the Jewish "condition." Instead, he tried to fix it.

Herzl was born 150 years ago on May 2. It is imperative that we mark the day, note his life, and express our thanks.

"Herzl transformed a mood into a political movement and put it on the European map as one of the national movements aspiring to what in a later age would be called national liberation," wrote historian Walter Laqueur in A History of Zionism (Schocken Books).

Theodor Herzl

Despite his western European (Viennese/Parisian) bearing and culture, he was greeted with adulation and frenzied cheers on one famous trip to Vilna in eastern Europe.

Laqueur wrote: "Tens of thousands shouted 'Hedad' (Hail) as he passed.

About the reception, Herzl wrote in his diary that the day would remain engraved forever in his memory. It was the first time that he had come face to face with the Jewish masses in east Europe. The unhappiness of these oppressed people was only too genuine. He had been warned of the bitter opposition of the Bundists – the anti-Zionist Jewish socialists – and he watched with some misgivings the approach of some young working men, with hard determined expressions on their faces, whom he took to belong to that party. Much to his amazement, one of them came forward and proposed a toast to the day when 'melech Herzl' (King Herzl) would reign."

Herzl did not succeed in his various schemes to persuade either the Ottomans or the British to provide the territorial space for the Jewish homeland. But it can be argued that he laid the foundation for the subsequent achievements that would crown the efforts of the men and women who succeeded him.

Laqueur recorded that Herzl's "death came as a tremendous shock. For hundreds of thousands of Jews in eastern Europe this was the saddest day of their life. Herzl had created the Zionist movement almost single-handed. He symbolized their dearest hopes and their longing for a better future. He had been the new Moses who would lead them out of the house of bondage to the promised land.

"Herzl had stipulated in his will that he should be buried like the poorest of the poor. But many thousands came to pay their last respects to him."

In 1949, the new State of Israel reinterred Herzl's remains on a mountain on the western slopes of Jerusalem that now bears his name. A plain, sombre, black square of marble with the name Herzl inscribed in Hebrew marks the site. He is, finally, where he wanted to be.

His dreams must now be ours.

CUBAN MISSION

A young adult mission from Yaldeinu travelled to Havana earlier this month. The group of six, joined by members of the Macabi Youth Organization, is pictured in front of the Cuban city's Jewish cemetery. Yaldeinu founder Michael Ettedgui is in the back row, fourth from left, and mission chair Alexandra Bronfman is fourth from left, in front. Among other projects, the group repaired damaged tombstones, visited shut-ins and brought medical supplies to the Jewish community.

Yom Ha'atzmaut

Band-tastic fun for Israel's birthday

The Jewish National Fund of Canada's Toronto region celebrated Yom Ha'atzmaut with food, drinks and lots of music at the Eglinton Grand last week. This year, JNF moved Band-tastic, an annual dance devoted to party bands, from August to April to mark Israel's 62nd anniversary. Band-tastic, which took some four months to organize, included about a dozen bands. Toronto bandleader Larry Rodness helped start Band-tastic three years ago as a way for Toronto bands to get together and raise money for JNF. Pictured above are JNF Toronto executive director Josh Cooper, right, posing with JNF Toronto president Jerry Werger and a cut-out of Theodor Herzl; and, below, Rodness who performed with singer Kira Callahan, left, and singer-bandleader George St. Kitts, centre.

Yom Ha'atzmaut

Partygoers attending a party for Israel's 62nd Yom Ha'atzmaut were treated to entertainers on stilts, song and dance and lots of flags at Mel Lastman Square last week. Earlier in the day at Queen's Park, the Israeli flag, above, was raised in a ceremony attended by members of each political party in the legislature, as well as community leaders and about 100 girls from Ulpanat Orot high school. [Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf photos]

Theodor Herzl 1860 - 1904

So profoundly moved by his resolve, so overwhelmed by feelings of pride and even by a sense of personal moral indebtedness to him for his courage, many people actually named their children after him. The mere mention of his name often evoked sighs of appreciation and images of biblical grandeur.

Theodor Herzl was born 150 years ago on May 2 (Iyar 10). His life, alas, was too brief, for he died at the age of 44. But the intersection of his life and the line of Jewish history shattered the geometry of ordinary events. The Jewish future would soon tip on a new fulcrum.

Eight years before his death, in February 1896, he published his seminal work Der Judenstaat (The Jewish State). The nub of this small book was a call for the Jews of the world to become sovereign in their own land. His words ignited the low-burning embers in the smouldering Jewish heart, where a return to the historic homeland was already being discussed. And where the discussion had not yet started, he set it in motion.

One year later, in September 1897, Herzl organized and galvanized the first Zionist Congress in Basel, Switzerland. He electrified the assembled delegates. "A people can be helped only by itself; and if it cannot do that, then it cannot be helped."

In A History of Zionism (Schocken Books, New York 2003), Walter Laqueur described how the message was received. "Herzl was greeted with tremendous applause lasting 15 minutes." The occasion "was a milestone in modern Jewish history."

The non-Jewish world now knew that national Jewish consciousness was stirring.

The Jewish world now had a beacon to cast light into an unclear future. From that moment forward, untold millions of Jews looked with tearful eyes and yearning hearts toward its glow. It became their hope for a safer, better, freer future.

Herzl was jubilant after the congress. He recorded the following notation in his diary. "If I were to sum up the congress in a word – which I shall take care not to publish – it would be this. At Basel, I founded the Jewish state. If I said this out loudly today I would be greeted by laughter. In five years, perhaps, and certainly in 50 years, everyone will perceive it."

He was prophetic.

Fifty years and nine months after he wrote those words, the Jews of Mandatory Palestine – knowing that by doing so they would have to fight to save their lives and their national dream – proclaimed the State of Israel.

For eternity now may it exist. And for eternity too may we always acknowledge the good that Theodor Herzl did for his people and indeed, for the world.

25 years ago in The CJN

Israel and the United States signed a free trade agreement – unprecedented in the history of U.S. trade policy – to remove all barriers on goods and services exchanged between the two countries. The deal aimed to eliminate the trade barriers in phases over a 10-year period.

Remembering the Canadians

Last week, on Yom Hazikaron, we honoured the memory of those who died fighting for Israel or were the victims of terror. I would like to remember the 11 Canadian Machalniks, volunteers who died fighting for the establishment of the State of Israel in the 1948 War of Independence.

The list was compiled by the late Eddy Kaplansky, who was a Machal pilot and historian.

George "Buzz" Beurling of Verdun, Que., a World War II fighter pilot was killed near Rome May 20 in the crash of an airplane being prepared for a flight to Israel. He was buried in the Haifa Military Cemetery, non-Jewish section.

Harvey Cohen and Ed Lugech, first cousins from Toronto, served in the Palmach Yiftach Brigade. They were declared missing and believed waylaid by Arab irregulars near Sarafand in late June.

Reuben Schiff of Toronto served on the Aliya-Bet ship Paducah. He was killed July 1 near Abu Jab while looking for shipmate and Palmach comrade Lou Ball, and buried in Nachlat Yitzchak.

Sidney Rubinoff of Toronto served with the Palmach in several battles. He was wounded at Latrun July 17, died on the way to hospital and was buried at Nachlat Yitzchak.

Sidney Leisure of Toronto served in the 7th Brigade, 72nd Battalion and was killed Sept. 7 in the battle for Tamra hill in the Galilee. He was buried in Nahariya.

Leonard Fitchett of Vancouver, an ex-RCAF pilot, served in the 103rd Squadron and was downed in his Beaufighter on Oct. 20. He was buried in the Haifa Military Cemetery, non-Jewish section.

Wilfred Canter (pilot) of Toronto, Willy Fisher (navigator) of Winnipeg, Fred Stevenson (co-pilot) of Vancouver: the three RCAF veterans served in the 103rd Squadron. During a night supply run to Sedom on Oct. 24, their C-47 exploded in the air after an engine caught fire. Canter and Fisher were buried in Rehovot, and Stevenson was buried in the Haifa Military Cemetery, non-Jewish section.

Ralph Moster of Vancouver, a pilot, was killed Dec. 7 with three others when their Grumman Widgeon crashed into the Sea of Galilee during a training flight. He was buried in Nachlat Yitzchak.

March participants focus on the future

The March of the Living is about survival ("'Hitler did not win,'" Perspectives, April 8). It commemorates those who throughout the course of the Holocaust would not succumb to inhumanity, degradation, hate, cruelty and senseless murder. If we forget the Holocaust, history is destined to repeat itself.

If someone shares her or his first-hand experience from the depths of her or his soul, if the heart-wrenching accounts backed by powerfully moving evidence in front of them are shared in person, there is a better chance that we will remember. It is also more likely that we will internalize the consequences of hate and ignorance.

Those who marched during the Shoah shuffled slowly and weakly. The exhausted shells of once-healthy men, women and children were often brought to their knees, their eyes forced to look only at the ground. Now, old and young, Jew and gentile, walk together with vigorous animation, strength and resilience, their eyes and minds focused on the future.

There is yet another ominous force expanding insidiously throughout Europe and beyond. The extremist form of Islam is rapidly changing the face of Europe. The need for awareness, vigilance and proactive initiatives are now even more critical to our continued survival. God bless and protect the March of the Living program and all those who participate in its ongoing activities. May it continue well into the future as our future may be significantly influenced by March participants' gentle but strong hands.

Seeking her uncle

I recently received a stunning piece of information from the International Tracing Service. My uncle, Menachim Jehuda Galas (also known as Yehuda or Moniek), apparently survived the Holocaust and was liberated from Theresienstadt (Terezin).

Jehuda, my mother's beloved brother, was born in 1920. He was in the Lodz ghetto, then deported to Skarzysko-Kamienna, and then Buchenwald. He stayed in Buchenwald until April 1945 and was apparently deported to Terezin, which was liberated in April 1945, but I do not know what happened to him or others liberated from this camp.

I have been told that many Jews in the furrier-leather business came to Canada. My Galas family members were in this business in Lodz. If any of your readers can provide further information about my missing uncle, could they please contact me?

U.S. Jewish leaders criticize, defend Obama

By RON KAMPEAS
JTA

With anxiety over the White House's Middle East policy mounting in some pro-Israel circles, several Jewish organizational leaders have found themselves in a discomfiting position: criticizing the Obama administration in public while stridently defending the president in private against the most extreme attacks.

It's an upside-down version of what pro-Israel groups usually do: lavishing praise on the U.S. government of the day for sustaining the "unbreakable bond" while making their criticisms known quietly, behind closed doors.

The criticism has come in the form of mostly polite statements and newspaper ads questioning Obama administration pressure on Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's government, particularly regarding building in eastern Jerusalem. Such criticisms are voiced as well in private meetings with administration officials.

The defence comes up in dealings with irate donors and constituents, in phone calls, e-mails, addresses to small Jewish groups and shul talk. The theme of the complaints is consistent, and shocking, said multiple leaders, who all spoke off the record, and reflect the subterranean rumblings about the president heard during the campaign: his sympathy lies with Muslims, he doesn't care about Israel, he's an anti-Semite.

The Jewish Federations of North America is sufficiently concerned about the phenomenon to have convened a "fly-in" of Jewish organizational leaders to Washington for an as yet unannounced date in May. The leaders will meet with White House, State Department and congressional officials, in part to "to convey concerns about U.S.-Israel relations" – but also, insiders say, to allay those concerns.

One recent flood of anxious queries followed the Obama administration's announcement earlier this month of its long-awaited nuclear policy. The reality of the policy was a pledge not to threaten with nuclear weapons those nations that provably disavow their nuclear weapons capability. Nations that continued to maintain a threatening nuclear posture, the policy made clear, would still face the prospect of a U.S. nuclear response should they attack the United States or its allies.

Obama named Iran as such a nation.

Yet instead of being reassured, donors and members of national Jewish groups flooded Jewish leaders with anxious queries about a posture that they interpreted as being aimed at embracing a nuclear Iran and forcing Israel to abandon its own reported nuclear capability.

Another persistent – and unfounded – rumour has it that Obama removed the phrase "Next Year in Jerusalem" from the White House seder in March.

"Where… are they getting this?" asked a senior official at an organization that has been publicly critical of Obama since last summer.

Angst was stoked, too, when Obama spoke this month of peacemaking throughout the world necessitated by the cost of "American blood and treasure" through involvement in conflicts. It didn't help that a New York Times analysis suggested the president had said that the lack of Israeli-Palestinian peace threatened U.S. troops in other parts of the globe – even though the transcript of Obama's remarks did not bear out any such linkage, and other Obama administration officials flatly denied one existed.

Jewish officials said a share of the blame lay with the Obama administration, partly for not adequately reaching out to Jews and to Israel, and partly because of the emergence of what appears to be internecine policy wars.

"The real story of the New York Times story is not that he's changing Israel policy," said another leader of an organization that has not been shy about criticizing the Obama administration. "The real story is, why are officials leaking" misrepresentations of his policy "to the New York Times?"

On the other side, one leader blamed the Netanyahu government for sending mixed signals on how to handle the tensions between Israel and the United States over settlement policy.

"Some are saying quiet is the best answer, and others are saying loud noise is the best answer," the Jewish organizational official said.

The official cited reports that Netanyahu personally approved public letters – from Ronald Lauder, president of the World Jewish Congress (WJC), and Elie Wiesel, the internationally known Holocaust survivor and Nobel Peace laureate – criticizing Obama's demand for a halt in Jerusalem building.

Despite mounting criticism by some Jewish leaders, polls show that Obama's support among Jews in general remains strong. His backing has dropped from astronomical highs after he was elected, but remains about 10 points stronger than in the general population. Moreover, to the degree that it has eroded, the dissatisfaction with Obama appears to have more to do with unhappiness over his handling of health care and the economy than it does Israel.

Those who are expressing their concerns, however, are among the most active members of the pro-Israel community and help set the tone for the trilateral U.S.-Israel-Jewish leadership ties. Some are acquiring their information from anti-Obama e-mail blasts and consistently partisan critics of Obama.

A file photo of Senator Barack Obama, as he then was, speaking to the annual AIPAC conference in Washington. [RNS]

Richard Baehr, writing in the conservative online magazine the American Thinker, cited the New York Times' misreading of Obama's remarks in arguing that "this president is the greatest threat to the strategic alliance of the U.S. and Israel since the founding of the modern Jewish state in 1948."

McLaughlin & Associates, a GOP polling firm, touted signs this month that Jewish support for Obama was eroding, but its survey questions were premised on shaky assertions. One question posited that Obama would support a unilateral declaration of Palestinian independence, although U.S. officials have consistently said they would oppose such a move. Another suggested that Obama was ready to force Israel to give up the Jewish quarter in Jerusalem's Old City, although there has been no such pressure.

Administration defenders cite signs suggesting that beyond the settlement rhetoric, the relationship is improving: Obama has increased defence co-operation, for instance, and strategic consultations between officials of both nations are more frequent than they have been in a decade.

"Our bond with Israel is unshakable and unbreakable, both as it relates to security, as it relates to a common set of values and also as a common strategic vision, because the threats to Israel are similar to some of the threats the United States faces," Rahm Emanuel, Obama's chief of staff, said last week on Bloomberg TV.

Jewish leaders welcome such reassurances, but say they are made defensively, and they repeatedly call on the Obama administration to become proactive.

Robert Wexler, the former Florida congressman who was Obama's chief Jewish proxy during the election and now heads the Center for Middle East peace, suggested a more proactive posture was in the offing.

"Actions in the next several months will begin to reflect it," he told JTA.

Notably, Emanuel held a behind-closed-doors meeting last week with a group of leading Orthodox rabbis.

Meanwhile, Jewish leaders are walking a tightrope trying to balance traditional deference to the administration with concerns over the tensions. They also object to what they see as the unwarranted pressure on Netanyahu as opposed to relatively little pressure on the Palestinians to join talks that Israel has embraced with enthusiasm. Israel, they hasten to argue, remains America's best friend in the region.

Lee Rosenberg, the president of the American Israel Public Affairs Committee, made the Israel-is-our-best-friend case last week at Israel Independence Day celebrations, sharing the stage with Obama's top political adviser, David Axelrod.

"Israel stood by America in spirit and in action after the tragic events of 9/11," Rosenberg said. "As both our great nations fight the same scourge of terrorism and Islamic extremism, it is Israel which serves on the front lines as an outpost of American interests in a dangerous part of the world."

The Wiesel and Lauder letters offered a suggestive contrast on how to handle the tensions.

Wiesel's critique was oblique, not naming Obama, and deferred to U.S. orthodoxy that a final-status agreement must accommodate Palestinian claims to the city.

"What is the solution?" Wiesel asked. "Pressure will not produce a solution. Is there a solution? There must be, there will be."

Lauder, by contrast, directly addressed Obama and suggested the president was sacrificing Israel to improve relations with the Muslim world.

"The administration's desire to improve relations with the Muslim world is well known," said Lauder, an active Republican. "But is friction with Israel part of this new strategy? Is it assumed worsening relations with Israel can improve relations with Muslims?"

One of the Jewish leaders said the contrast was instructive.

"For all intents and purposes, the WJC's relationship with the White House ended last week," he said of the group Lauder heads. "That's not a relationship that pro-Israel groups can afford to have over the next couple of years."

Abraham Foxman of the Anti-Defamation League has publicly criticized the administration on several Israel-related fronts. Still, he said, Jewish leaders have a responsibility to defend the president "when talking to those who accuse him of being an enemy of Israel or a Muslim."

"For many years, you had a lot of Jews who didn't vote for President Bush who would say, 'I don't like Bush but I love what he's doing on Israel,'" Foxman said.

"Now the paradigm is changing. A lot of Jews are saying, 'I like Obama, but I don't like what he is doing on Israel.'"

Foxman added that the most frequent question he hears when speaking to Jewish audiences is whether Obama is a friend of Israel.

"I say yes, but what's wrong is the implementation of what he promised. What's flawed is the strategy, not the goal," Foxman said.

The ADL leader quickly added that despite promises to learn from past mistakes, the administration's handling of Israel-related issues is "going from bad to worse."

In search of identity

Nowadays, when both religion and Zionism are often hijacked by extremists, Jewish leaders are in search of new slogans to appeal to the mainstream.

In the decades after the Holocaust it was "survival," turned into a religious category: Emil Fackenheim's 614th commandment not to give Hitler a posthumous victory.

Rabbi Dow Marmur in Toronto

Later we heard a lot about "Jewish continuity" as a way of linking the past with responsibility for the future. Now it's "identity," a term that echoes this age of the therapeutic and implies that a whole person is one who knows who he or she really is – in our case, Jewish.

Identity became the catch phrase of the meeting of the board of governors of the Jewish Agency earlier this year. Its new head, Natan Sharansky, offered identity as an alternative to Zionism. As Israel's population is steadily growing and that of the Diaspora diminishing, it's no longer enough to bring Jews to Israel. Judaism and Israel must now be brought to Jews wherever they live. His views were echoed in speeches by Israeli President Shimon Peres and Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

This is music to the ears of many Diaspora leaders, particularly the Americans, who perceive Zionism in philanthropic, not ideological, terms. To have their views confirmed by the leader of the organization that has historically been responsible for bringing Jews to Israel can be seen as a vindication of the "post-Zionist" way.

It's motivated by the fact that whereas the Jewish population of Israel is steadily increasing, albeit nowadays because of the high birthrate among haredi anti-Zionists, the number of Jews in the rest of the world is declining. Having accepted that its ability to bring Jews to the Jewish state has greatly diminished, the Jewish Agency now appears to want to concentrate on education that will strengthen the commitment of non-Israelis to their Jewish heritage.

As the assumption implies that this can be done without either ideology or religion, it's bound to fail. Jewish identity, together with Jewish survival and Jewish continuity, will soon end up as yet another footnote in the history of contemporary Judaism. For there can be no Judaism, especially in the Diaspora, outside its religious framework.

That's why the modernist religious movements in contemporary Judaism stand a much better chance to succeed in their endeavours to reach out to those on the margin, particularly the intermarried. Instead of mouthing empty slogans and undermining the religious streams in the Diaspora, Israel's political leaders must pay more attention to those who know that survival, continuity and identity are all by-products of serving God.

What is pluralistic Jewish education?

There is growing interest across the Jewish world, in Israel and the Diaspora, in pluralistic Jewish education. In North America, some of the energy in this movement comes from the growth of community schools, day and supplementary, and this development is partly due to a post-denominational preference among young families. Synagogue membership isn't the primary community-identification factor it once was, and schools are now seen as a basis for community.

Seymour Epstein in Toronto

In this usage, the word "community" has double significance. It indicates a school with a broader ideological base, but it also speaks of potential for a mini-community of specific interest based in schooling.

In Israel, much of the interest in pluralistic Jewish education came as a reaction to the religious/secular split in the population and all of the varieties of public schooling that represent different ideologies. Institutions such as Elul, Kolot, Almah, Machon Hartman and Oranim, along with schools such as Keshet, Dror, and the Meitarim chain now constitute a movement that cares deeply about Jewish literacy, gives equal respect to Jewish texts and values across the ages and from a rainbow of sources, and honours all the movements in Jewish life – from the early Israelite cult to the latest post-modern manifestations.

In both North America and Israel, there's a great deal of ambiguity about how one translates the lofty goals of a pluralist setting into curriculum and daily life. Whether it's at a community day school in Toronto or a mixed religious/secular school in Tel Aviv, the problems present themselves from the first day. There's so much past history to overcome and such an unclear future to chart. Teachers, themselves, come from ideological settings. Students, too. How does one stand tall in the belief system one starts with, yet show deep respect for the other and be willing to grow and perhaps change? Is change in any direction respected by all?

Let's get concrete. Are observant parents willing to see less observance in their child as a result of mixed classes? Will a Reform Jew be pleased if her son suddenly spouts Orthodox ideas? And how does one train (or in most cases, re-train) teachers to teach in a pluralist fashion?

Perhaps there's a path that, in its dynamic process, will search for curricular questions, create a research atmosphere that's pluralistic, bridge Israeli education and Diaspora Jewish education, and ultimately produce materials that can be successfully utilized in pluralistic settings.

There are certain values unique to Jewish life that can be explored in pluralist settings. They must not become the sum total of Judaic and Hebrew studies, but they could constitute a large part of the content in a Jewish curriculum. While it's clear that not all Diaspora Jewish schools, nor all Israeli ones, would be interested in such a program, those institutions that are community-based and want to pursue a pluralistic approach could network with each other to discuss values such as chesed, tzedakah, shalom, Shabbat, kashrut, or la'goyim (kindness beyond the law, the just distribution of wealth, the fullness of peace, special time, sacred eating, light unto other nations), etc.

Certainly, there will be no full agreement on any Jewish value (except perhaps to answer a question with yet another question!), but that's the very spirit and substance of pluralistic education. There are, to be sure, certain clarities that can be taught with little disagreement, but the ability to believe strongly in one position and yet see the possibility of another human mind and heart believing something quite different is at the core of such an approach.

Being able to modify one's own beliefs also enables the teacher to imagine a student being transformed by new ideas. Missionary teachers need not apply, but teachers with a pluralistic mission are the ones most qualified for this kind of dialogue with students and subject matter.

If we bridge this attempt across the ocean, Israeli Zionist education will come to include new approaches to world Jewry, and conversely, Diaspora Jewish education will mature in its views of contemporary Israel and Israelis.

We are our ancestors – and then some

Perhaps it was inevitable, a natural progression, that the era of the memoir would give way to the era of genealogy.

Memoir, from the French word for memory, is a personal account of its author's lived experience, especially (but not only) in relation to historical events. Cultural critics have noted the burgeoning of memoirs written over the past few decades, and a surging readership for the genre.

Genealogy, from the Greek genea, or generation, is the study of family lineage. Web-based resources, access to archives, and air travel have facilitated genealogical research. Recent popular media have shown an increased attention to the details and complexities of family history.

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

The memoir asks: who have I been, where have I been, what have I witnessed, discovered, determined? It probes individual memory to learn about the self in time, culture and history.

Genealogy ventures past the limitations of individual memory. It asks: where do I come from, or more precisely, whom do I come from? By implication, it asks also: how does what I cannot personally recollect shape who and what I have become?

It is not surprising to see a particularly Jewish interest in both areas. After all, Jews have a longstanding attachment to memory and a way of intertwining personal and collective memory. Genealogy in particular carries a Jewish resonance. Our Jewish names use ben or bat, son or daughter of, rather than more generic last names. We honour our ancestry, make pilgrimages to graves and recycle given names through untold generations. The concept of z'chut avot – the merit of ancestors – dates back to ancient sources.

Not only Jews are drawn to genealogy. We are, you might say, outdone by Mormons, who invest major resources in researching lines of ancestry. Mormons believe that salvation may be granted to the unconverted dead, whose ancestors may save their souls by baptizing them posthumously and by proxy.

But it is not only religious or cultural motives that draw people to genealogy. The growing interest in lineage and family history is evidenced not only by the clubs and websites dedicated to the study, but by the popularity of television programs focused on unravelling the tangled bits of family history.

Harvard professor of African American studies Skip Gates created a miniseries, Faces of America, that traces the genetic roots of several well-known contemporary Americans. The British series, Who Do You Think You Are, has, since 2004, mapped the genealogical past of a diverse collection of celebrities, including cook Nigella Lawson, actors Jeremy Irons and Kim Cattrall, and talk show host and agent provocateur Jerry Springer. A Canadian version of the series was inaugurated in 2007, an American one in 2010. There are Australian, Irish, Swedish, Polish and other versions.

As episodes of these programs illustrate, researching one's past brings new information, confirmation or debunking of family lore, amid an intensification of emotion. Who are we with relation to our ancestral past? Meryl Streep stated it succinctly in the Gates series: "We are nothing but them."

Streep's statement pinpoints both the reasons people develop such an intense interest in uncovering their roots, and at the same time, the dangers of this interest. There is an "aha" moment, a sense of recognition, in uncovering an ancestor whose talents, temperament, virtues or even flaws resemble our own. We sense, too, how our identities, forged on North American soil, bear the traces of other, earlier cultures, places where our ancestors dwelled. We learn to respect the complexity of our coming into being, especially if we may infuse it with pride in where we have come from.

At the same time, there is the danger of reducing the past into a kind of narcissism, where the people who came before us serve nothing more than to highlight that most fascinating of subjects – ourselves. Even more dangerous is to develop a kind of essentialism – the idea that everything about us can be explained by our familial lineage, the notion that we are, as Streep put it, "nothing more" than the sum of our ancestral parts.

Call it my modernist sense of endless possibilities, or my Jewish sense of the soul's potential. From where and whom we come matters, but it does not determine our destiny.

The Kirshner File

Kazin was a stellar figure in American culture

Alfred Kazin, one of America's most widely read and influential literary critics, rose from the poverty of Brownsville – a mainly Jewish neighbourhood in Brooklyn frequented by immigrants like his parents – and made his debut in 1942 with a masterful study of American literature, On Native Grounds.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto.

Only 27 when it was published to much acclaim, Kazin proved he was not a one-book wonder when, nine years later, he wrote A Walker in the City, a classic about the Jewish immigrant experience in the United States and a central text of American-Jewish writing.

For the next four decades, Kazin, who had close personal ties with a brilliant group of writers and academics known as the "New York intellectuals," produced trenchant criticism (The Portable Blake and A Lifetime Burning in Every Moment), a pungent memoir (Starting Out in the Thirties) and reams of book reviews for publications ranging from the New York Times to the New Republic.

Dead now for more than a decade, Kazin was a great man of letters. In recognition of his manifold talents and contributions, Richard M. Cook, a professor of American literature at the University of Missouri-Saint Louis, has written Alfred Kazin: A Biography (Yale University Press), a rounded but sympathetic portrait that draws on Kazin's private journals and correspondence and on numerous conversations with him.

Thorough in scope, Cook's work ranges far and wide, examining Kazin's childhood, his days as a City College student, his development as a writer, his troubled marriages, his relationships with important figures and his connection with Israel.

Born on June 5, 1915, Kazin was raised in an insulated corner of New York City populated by the largest concentration of Jews after the Lower East Side. He would recall that Brownsville was like an eastern European shtetl where Yiddish was the lingua franca. His parents, Gedalia (Charles) and Gita, were Polish Jews who had settled in the United States in 1907. His father was a housepainter who was often unemployed, while his mother was a garment factory worker. A self-admitted mama's boy, he considered her the dominant force in his youth. Her death sent him into shock and sadness.

Desperately poor, the Kazins lived in a cold water tenement freezing in winter and unbearably hot in summer.

Shy and insecure, with few friends and no "gang" or "movement" to occupy him, Kazin turned to books and writing. "I was happiest when alone, reading," he observed in a notebook.

Fortunately, one of his high school English teachers, having spotted his writing talent, strongly encouraged him to pursue it. At 16, he enrolled at City College, where tuition was free, and there he cultivated his taste for literature. City College was an incubator of talent and among its graduates in the 1930s were two Nobel laureates in science, Robert Hofstadter and Arthur Kornberg, and a galaxy of writers from Irving Howe to Bernard Malamud.

While still a student, Kazin contributed book reviews to major publications, on Elizabethan poetry, British detective novels, American immigrant fiction, contemporary criticism and the philosophy of William James. He would remain a book reviewer until his death on June 5, 1998. Kazin was a natural reviewer. He had an appetite for new topics. He was intensely curious. He could bore to the core with effortless ease.

To supplement his income, Kazin taught the occasional course at City College and dramatized stories by Edgar Allan Poe for a Brooklyn radio station, but it was a hand-to-mouth existence.

In the summer of 1938, he received a master's degree in history, and shortly afterward, one of his teachers, the critic Carl Van Doren, suggested he write a critical history of modern American prose. He spent the next five years on it, conducting his research at the New York Public Library, usually for 12 hours a day and five to six days a week.

It was a risky undertaking, since he could not be sure whether he could produce a publishable manuscript. But On Native Grounds, which dealt with the period from 1890 to 1940, was praised for its ambition, buoyant style and balanced judgment. Kazin would remember this project as one of the happiest times of his life.

Shortly after immersing himself in the book, he married Natasha Dohn, a research bacteriologist of Russian Jewish descent. But Kazin had a roving eye, and the marriage broke down. It was the first of several marriages that ended badly, Cook notes.

A socialist, Kazin initially opposed the United States' entry into World War II, but he changed his mind as Germany expanded its grip on Europe.

The week On Native Grounds was published, Kazin was hired by the New Republic as its literary editor. In this capacity, he met a procession of writers and critics from Lionel Trilling to Dwight McDonald. In 1943, he accepted a lucrative paying job from Time-Life publisher Henry Luce to be a writer on the staff of Fortune magazine.

Alfred Kazin in 1986, 12 years before his death.

Kazin thought his think pieces on American prophetic literature would find a place in its pages, but he was wrong. And much to his disappointment, he also discovered that Luce would not send him abroad on war reporting assignments. So Kazin quit, eking out a living reading manuscripts for a well-known publishing house and selling book reviews.

Kazin was an unobservant Jew before the Holocaust, but in its wake, he became "much more consciously Jewish," Cook quotes him as saying. Years later, he wrote the first major review of Elie Wiesel's novel, Night, and befriended the heretofore unknown author.

With A Walker in the City, a tender memoir that Cook hails as "a canonical text" but some critics panned, Kazin's reputation was assured.

Yet Kazin had to scramble to make ends meet, and did so by teaching at universities (Amherst and New York University), lining up magazine assignments and writing more books, notably New York Jew.

Like many of his friends and acquaintances, he resided in New York's Upper West Side, which the Columbia University sociologist Daniel Bell described as as sort of "intellectual kibbutz." In New York Jew, Cook notes, Kazin satirized the members of "the Upper West Side Hebrew Relief Association" as a sour lot who were disillusioned with their politically radical past.

Although he considered himself a man of the left, Kazin was hostile to Marxism, complained about the "complacency" of the New Left and warned of the perils of Soviet expansionism and the spread of "totalitarian" communism.

In 1960, shortly after the Nazi war criminal Adolf Eichmann was caught by the Mossad, Kazin was invited to Israel. He had never been a Zionist, saw no need for a Jewish state, paid little attention to Israeli affairs and was uneasy about its growing nationalism and militancy. Kazin grew to care about Israel, but he deplored the policies of the Likud.

By the 1960s, Kazin was at the top of his game, appearing regularly in the Reporter, Partisan Review, Commentary and the New York Times Book Review, but regretting his one and only appearance in Playboy.

In the years before his death, he was always busy. By Cook's reckoning, he published five books and more than 50 articles and reviews, and taught dozens of courses. He was a stellar figure in American culture, and Cook portrays him as such in this illuminating biography.

We have felt secure with Romspen for 30 years.

The most important factor to me is the security of our life savings, and for 30 years we have felt secure investing our savings in Romspen managed mortgages. I felt so pleased with how well they are looking after our money that 15 years ago I encouraged my mother-in-law to do the same. More recently my brother-in-law and sister-in-law have become Romspen Fund investors. My husband and I go to a few seminars each year, and I find them very informative and helpful. We have also encouraged many friends to invest in the Romspen Mortgage Fund, and they are all very satisfied, especially with the monthly returns.

Congress hosts interfaith panel

By RON CSILLAG
Special to The CJN

In a first for a meeting of Canadian Jewish Congress, representatives of the three Abrahamic religions came together last Sunday to discuss and promote their commonalities as sources of strength and hope.

At the same time, the members of the Jewish, Muslim and Christian faiths tiptoed around the one issue that has proven divisive, namely, Israel.

Nora Sanders, general secretary of the United Church of Canada and Mubarak Nazir of the Ahmadiyya Muslim community joined Victor Goldbloom, CJC's senior interfaith representative, in a wide-ranging discussion on the subject, "The Abrahamic Faiths in Canada: Challenges and Opportunities."

The interfaith panel took place immediately after CJC's annual general meeting, held at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue. The program drew about 100 people.

Israel came up only fleetingly in the multifaith discussion, and Sanders mostly avoided referring to the recent tensions that have bedeviled relations between the United Church and the Jewish community.

In his talk, Goldbloom, who once headed the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews (CCCJ), said that the CCCJ, over its 62 years, has helped the two faiths "work through a great deal of misunderstanding, and transformed that into understanding." That has included work on social problems as well as a better understanding of the life and ministry of Jesus, Goldbloom said.

From left, Mubarak Nazir, Nora Sanders and Victor Goldbloom at last Sunday's interfaith panel.

A "very well-kept secret" is "the scope and intensity" of dialogue among Jews, Muslims and Christians in Israel, he added.

Said Goldbloom: "Yes, there is an anti-suicide bomber barrier in Israel," which has "saved a remarkable number of lives."

And he said he "cannot understand" why Israeli Apartheid Week occurs annually on university campuses.

Later, in response to a question, Goldbloom said he couldn't provide a legal definition of apartheid, but he hinted that the annual week of anti-Israel activity is counter-productive. "Peace will come only when the two sides stop blaming each other."

In his first time in a synagogue, Nazir stressed that like Jews, Ahmadiyya Muslims have known their share of bigotry. Rejected as heretics by traditional Muslims for their unique beliefs, followers of the Ahmadiyya branch are oppressed in places such as Pakistan, Bangladesh and Indonesia.

"We are persecuted," Nazir stated, adding, "our definition of jihad as primarily a war to correct our inner animal passions is at variation with [that of] many other Muslims."

He called the boundaries separating the three Abrahamic faiths "artificial. The bonds that bring us together are tolerance. We must learn from each other. We are children of the same compassionate, merciful and benevolent God.

"When will the killing stop?"

Sanders provided an overview of the history and structure of the 85-year-old United Church, Canada's largest Protestant denomination, which she said has a "range or perspectives and views."

She said the 2001 census found three million members of the church, but church rolls tally just 650,000 members. It was the first national church in Canada to give full recognition to gays and lesbians as both members and clergy, Sanders noted.

Except for referring to the daily difficulties that Palestinians face, Sanders didn't touch on the recent Israel-related issues emanating from the church that have strained relations with Jews.

She did refer to a groundbreaking document the United Church issued in 2003. "Bearing Faithful Witness" was intended to strengthen relations with Jews and acknowledge a history of anti-Judaism within Christian theology and the United Church.

But things boiled over last summer when the church's General Council brought forth several resolutions calling for boycott, divestment and sanctions against Israel. They were defeated, but not without heated debate. The church also left open the possibility that future anti-Israel resolutions could be introduced.

The church was also discovered to have ties with Independent Jewish Voices, a small anti-Zionist group. A published report said the church had made a $900 grant to offset travel expenses to a 2008 conference where IJV was founded.

The church later distanced itself from IJV, saying it would not partner with it in the future.

In January, Congress CEO Bernie Farber said the United Church and CJC had reached a "breaking point" in their relationship. A Feb. 1 meeting between church delegates and CJC was intended to begin mending the frayed relationship.

In her remarks, Sanders said some resolutions come from the church's executive, while others come "from other parts of the church." She said she's hoping that a church task force will be appointed "to listen to all concerns" on the Middle East.

Meanwhile, "there are no simple answers."

Revitalized Stashover-Slipia shul turns 100

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

In the last few years, the average age of members at the Stashover-Slipia Congregation has decreased markedly – testimony not only to the passing of the 100-year-old shul's most senior members, but also an indication that the small, unpretentious congregation has started to succeed in its efforts to attract younger congregants.

On Shabbat morning, "sometimes we have five to six kids five and under," said Jay Safer, the shul president. As well, he noted, there are two bar mitzvahs and two bat mitzvahs scheduled for May and June, the first in "probably a year."

Four years ago, Safer said, an average Saturday morning service had about a dozen people, and now there are between 25 and more than 30. The synagogue also holds services on Sunday mornings and Jewish holidays.

The congregation will celebrate its 100th anniversary at a dinner May 16 in the Rooftop Salon of the Park Hyatt hotel. CJN editor Mordechai Ben-Dat, whose late father was gabbai at the shul for many years, will be the guest speaker.

Aside from the fact that the dinner venue can serve a kosher meal, it was chosen for its location on the hotel's 18th floor.

That was the impetus, "as silly as it sounds," said Safer, a 61-year-old third-generation member whose maternal grandparents came Stashov, Poland.

"It's perfect for our synagogue," he added, referring to the Hebrew letters that denote the number 18 and spell "chai," the word for life.

The Sultana Avenue synagogue – which has more than 100 member families and recently increased family dues to $400 a year – operates "on a shoestring" and is solvent, Safer said.

The congregation is an amalgamation of two synagogues established by Jewish immigrants. Its current building, just off Bathurst Street dates back to 1964, three years before the merger.

In an effort to infuse new life into the shul four years ago, changes such as allowing women to have aliyot and shortening Shabbat services to about two hours were introduced.

The Saturday morning services, at which men and women sit together, are preceded by coffee and rogelach. They are followed by interactive learning sessions led by educator Jack Lipinsky, who has led the services for 28 years. Congregants use Orthodox prayerbooks.

Carol Jupiter, a Toronto teacher who hadn't been affiliated with a synagogue for many years, joined Stashover-Slipia with her husband, Henzel, a couple of years ago, and both now serve on the board. She said she likes the non-judgmentalism and lack of formality.

"Nobody worries about decorum, which is the primary focus of some of the synagogues. Everybody participates."

Young children often help wrap the Torah, noted Jupiter, who is in her 60s. "It is really nice… It doesn't offer all the things, or any of the things, that the larger, more established synagogues have. But it offers a lot in the way of being very human."

Members organize kiddushes and clear the tables afterward, she said. "It's not a place of glamour. It's like your home."

"Everyone pitches in, and it's heimish," Lipinsky said.

He noted that, for many people, the social aspect of shul – particularly at the pre- and post-service programs – "is really powerful."

He added that guests at the shul are greeted, and someone sits with them. "We learn from the olden days… It was always informal. They davened in houses. It was very volunteeristic.

"It's fun. I think shul should be fun."

Canada's 'system doesn't work'

The American efforts are ongoing, he said, pointing to the case of John Demjanjuk, who was removed to Germany, where he is on trial for alleged crimes committed at the Sobibor and Majdanek death camp. Research in the United States in the lead-up to his deportation uncovered evidence against another alleged killer from the Belzec death camp, who, like Demjanjuk, served in the SS training camp at Trawniki. He is under investigation by German authorities.

In Canada, meanwhile, the case of Helmut Oberlander remains unresolved 10 years after a court found he lied about his involvement in a Nazi murder unit. Clearly, Canada's "system doesn't work," Zuroff said. Numerous appeals followed. "You can't go on ad infinitum and make a mockery of the system." The United States streamlined its system from seven potential appeals to three, ensuring suspects received due process. "The United States does not want Nazi war criminals. They prove it year after year. But I can't say the same about Canada."

In its reply to The CJN, the Justice Department stated, "It must be understood that the likelihood of commencing new cases from the World War II era diminishes with the passage of time, due to the age and availability of witnesses and the challenge of discovering new evidence relevant to these cases.

John Demjanjuk, currently on trial in Germany

"There are a series of World War II files that are under review. Our last published annual report indicated that we had 20 active files. The current number of active files is less than 20.

"We have completed approximately 1,500 files since the beginning of the program and have taken action in 21 cases. We continue to work on the remaining World War II files, employing our standard investigative procedures that include ongoing archival research and co-operation with other countries involved in this work."

Zuroff's report noted "a major change in Germany's prosecution policy," which resulted in two new trials, an indictment and numerous new investigations.

> 'You can't go on ad infinitum and make a mockery of the system'

Underscoring Zuroff's argument was a report from Germany last week that prosecutors in Hanover reopened an investigation into the case of a 95-year-old former SS captain accused of being involved in two 1943 massacres of Jews in the Polish city of Lublin.

However, a lack of political will remains a major obstacle to achieving justice in post-Communist eastern Europe, Zuroff said, and arguments that suspects are too old to prosecute are fallacious, as since 2001, at least 77 convictions have been obtained internationally and 51 new indictments filed.

"The success achieved by dedicated prosecution agencies, and particularly in the United States and Germany, should be a catalyst for governments all over the world to make a serious effort to maximize justice while it can still be obtained," he said.

The report includes a 10 most-wanted list, which continues to be headed by Alois Brunner, a key operative of Adolf Eichmann who was responsible for the deportations of tens of thousands of Jews from Austria, Greece, France and Slovakia to death camps. A resident of Syria for decades, Brunner was last seen in 2001 and if alive would be 98.

Others on the list includes Aribert Heim, a doctor in the Sachsenhausen, Buchenwald and Mauthhausen concentration camps who murdered dozens of inmates by lethal injection; Sandor Kepiro, a Hungarian gendarmerie officer who participated in the murder of at least 1,200 civilians in Novi Sad, Serbia; and Milivoj Asner, the police chief of Slavonska Pozega, Croatia, who resides in Austria and who allegedly deported hundreds of Serbs, Jews and Gypsies to their death.

Globe column caricatures Mideast conflict

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

In the April 6 Globe and Mail, Ian Brown wrote about his interview with New Yorker editor David Remnick, author of the recently released and much praised biography of Barack Obama, The Bridge.

When the conversation turned to the simplistic stereotypes of Obama promoted by "Rush Limbaugh and the Fox News dogs" (as Brown put it), Remnick dismissed such treatment with an expletive but quickly explained his own approach: "All I'm insisting on, as a journalist, is complexity. Everything is always more complex than the cartoon."

Looking at much of the reporting and commentary on Israel cannot but make you regret that Remnick's insight is not more widely shared. Instead of complexity, all too often there is the cartoon instead.

Currently, the cartoon about Israel amounts to the following: Israel's in occupation of Palestinian land and must act to end the occupation, except that Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu refuses to comply and so the conflict continues. Full stop.

If one objects that this characterization is itself a caricature of what's passing for analysis of Israel in some prestigious circles, consider what veteran columnist Jeffrey Simpson had to say in the Globe and Mail on April 20 ("Cracks in the bedrock of U.S.-Israel relations?").

Simpson wrote about "[t]he failure of Israelis and the Palestinian Authority even to talk to each other," without noting that Netanyahu has repeatedly urged the Palestinians to return to the negotiating table without preconditions. PA President Mahmoud Abbas refuses to do so, using U.S. President Barak Obama's tough approach with Israel over the settlement issue as an excuse to avoid taking Netanyahu up on his offer (even after Netanyahu agreed to a 10-month moratorium on settlement construction). Abbas even refuses to enter into indirect talks with Israel, using Obama's disagreement with Netanyahu over Jewish housing in east Jerusalem as an additional excuse not to engage with Israel.

Yet in Simpson's account, Abbas' refusal to speak with Israel was simply not mentioned. It's as if it doesn't really matter. For Simpson, the onus for the failure to return to negotiations falls entirely on Israel. Virtually ignoring what Netanyahu has said, Simpson argued that "Netanyahu occasionally says he's willing to talk, but little in his long career suggests he is committed to serious discussions, let alone formal negotiations." Netanyahu's policy is reduced by Simpson to one term – "obduracy."

Simpson's only reference to the Palestinians is to describe them merely as innocent victims of the "grave injustices that have systematically been done to [them]" by Israel, in particular by Israel's settlement policy.

According to Simpson, Abbas and the PA, and Hamas, bear no responsibility at all for the impasse in the peace process. Since Simpson ignored history, there was no mention of the fact that Abbas refused former Israeli prime minister Ehud Olmert's offer of a Palestinian state, an offer made during a negotiating process that wasn't conditioned on the cessation of settlement activity. For all of the controversy that surrounds them, settlements aren't the core of the impasse. (As this column has noted before, while a complicating factor, the settlement issue is resolvable, unlike the far deeper and seemingly unresolvable Palestinian rejection of Jewish sovereignty and their insistence on the "right of return" to present-day Israel.)

But, again, in Simpson's simplistic rendering, Palestinian rejectionism is not a factor since, apparently, Palestinian intentions and actions are of no concern.

All that matters is putting pressure on Israel alone. "That the Israelis can't be pushed [toward a deal] is obvious to objective observers," Simpson wrote, no doubt counting himself among this privileged "objective" crowd.

By failing to acknowledge the Palestinians as central actors with moral responsibility for their fate, and by reducing Israel's leaders to obdurate officials refusing to be "pushed' to a deal (under the wholly unwarranted assumption that a deal is just waiting to be had), Simpson drew what amounts to a caricature – a distillation of convenient clichés and what passes for conventional wisdom these days.

Uprising memorial features second generation

'To be a child of survivors is to have congress with ghosts'

By LAURA STRICKER
CJN Staff

Before dozens gathered to commemorate the 67th anniversary of the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising, in which the Jews remaining in the ghetto battled their German captors, a University of Lethbridge professor spoke about her second-hand Holocaust experience as the daughter of survivors.

Speaking at the Workmen's Circle-sponsored annual event on April 18, Goldie Morgentaler – the daughter of famed abortion-rights crusader Dr. Henry Morgentaler and Yiddish novelist Chana Rosenfarb – gave an impassioned speech on the difficulty of trying to make sense of what happened in the Holocaust without having experienced it personally.

"As time passes," Morgentaler said, "it takes with it the personal memory of personal experience. The result is that we who have not lived through this ordeal must, however unwillingly, become its historians.

"To be a child of survivors is to have congress with ghosts – to be overwhelmed with a sense of responsibility… an obligation to never let the dead be forgotten [and] to defend their honour, their names, their humanity [and] their valour."

Another problem with the passing of time, Morgentaler added, is that eventually all knowledge of the Holocaust will come from fictionalized and romanticized books and movies.

"The Holocaust is everywhere today," Morgentaler said, mentioning recent movies such as Defiance, The Reader and Inglourious Basterds.

"These movies cash in on a kind of easy emotion that is closer to entertainment than it is to historical reality. They evoke horror and a sentimentalized sense of redemption at the same time, all of it at a comfortable remove from what actually happened.

"I am afraid that as time goes by there will be more and more such fictionalizations… cut off from the reality of what actually happened. No one likes unadulterated, unmitigated horror. No one wants to believe that suffering the Jews experienced during the Holocaust has no purpose, that the dead can never be avenged. We want to be able to sleep at night. We want to feel that something good came out of something bad, even if the good is fiction."

Much of the memorial program was in Yiddish, with a variety of songs and poems presented. In particular, the poems of Holocaust survivor Abraham Sutzkever, who died this past January at age 96, were featured.

Avra Fainer, whose singing in Yiddish was featured throughout the program, said the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising has personal significance to her and her family.

"I'm named after my great uncle Avram, who was a fighter in the Uprising," Fainer said. "My family memorializes the uprising at our Passover Seder each year, along with participating in the Workmen's Circle memorial.

"Having heard the [Holocaust] stories from those who experienced them first-hand, I think it's crucial that I be able to at the very least participate in events such as this to help preserve the memories and keep them alive to the extent I'm able."

Another important reason to participate, Fainer said, is to preserve the Yiddish language, an overarching theme of the entire memorial.

"I feel like I am able to help preserve what many perceive as a dying language, since a great deal of people who spoke Yiddish died in the Holocaust. By singing in Yiddish, I feel like I'm helping to keep the language alive."

Morgentaler finished speaking by reciting a poem written by her mother, first in Yiddish, then translated into English.

"So He must come now and prove to me that one can burn, and be burned, and still remain God."

Anti-Israel slurs threaten gay parade's funding

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Pride Toronto says it's taking a closer look at applicants this year after complaints from Canadian and Israeli gay rights activists who documented what they call acrimonious anti-Israel and anti-Semitic propaganda at the 2009 event by a pro-Palestinian group.

Following the complaints, the City of Toronto has threatened to withdraw funding from the city's annual Pride Parade if the anti-Israel group is allowed to participate.

Tracey Sandilands

The city believes that its anti-discrimination policy was violated by the participation of Queers Against Israeli Apartheid (QuAIA) in the 2009 Pride Toronto parade, to which the city gave $121,000, the Toronto Star reported last week.

The decision by the city – which is among the world's gay-friendliest – came after repeated complaints by Martin Gladstone, a Toronto lawyer and gay rights activist, who made a film about QuAIA entitled Reclaiming our Pride. In the film, activists at Pride Toronto's 2009 parade call Israel an "apartheid state" and one of them wears a T-shirt with a crossed-out swastika.

Gladstone contends the group is falsely branding Israel and uses Nazi imagery to infer a linkage between the Jewish state's actions on Palestinian issues and those of the Third Reich.

His said that while groups such as QuAIA can espouse whatever beliefs they want, they have no place doing so at the parade, which is supposed to be strictly about celebrating gay achievements and issues.

Tracey Sandilands, Pride Toronto's executive director, told The CJN last week that she understands "the presence of QuAIA is problematic for many people" and that the group's message is not "a queer issue."

She said that as of last week, Pride had not yet received an application from QuAIA to participate in the 2010 parade, although the deadline is June 4.

If the group applies again this year, Sandilands said new "terms and conditions" have been added to the parade application package for prospective participants to "ensure [Pride] was covered from a liability point of view.

"If anything happens during the parade that could incite violence… and property is damaged or someone is injured, there are measures in place to remove them from the parade, to prevent them from participating in future parades and to take legal action against them." These new rules now apply to all participants.

As to whether QuAIA specifically would be accepted at Pride again this year, Sandilands said the "core messaging or theme" of its entry will be much more scrutinized than it was last year, because Pride now realizes it could be in contravention of the city's anti-discrimination policies, which she said her organization didn't understand last year.

The only difference from last year to this year is that the updated terms and conditions now provide for "consequences of breach of contract which weren't there in the past. We now intend to apply these terms and conditions across the board, where before it was very much laissez-faire," she said.

Pride's parade committee will review and approve or reject applications.

"There have been rejections in the past," she said, adding that this year, rejected applicants have the option to challenge the rejection and appeal it to Pride's board.

The city's threat to pull funding follows the announcement and cancellation last month of a Pride policy that would have parade signs reviewed by an ethics committee.

Elle Flanders, a Jewish member of Queers Against Israeli Apartheid, objected to the city comparing a political opinion on apartheid to hate speech.

"They're trying to compare it to hate speech, and I find it deeply offensive, as somebody who's been fighting human rights battles for a really long time, to hear that criticism of the State of Israel is somehow hate speech. No way," Flanders told the Star.

Discrimination: the ongoing, painful saga

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

Through A Sephardi Window

You will remember the case: the community of Immanuel in the West Bank was a town with only one school for girls. One school, yet one functioning with two exclusive educational streams. One school, but two curricula. One school, but two assemblies, two outings, two uniforms and two recesses. One school where even its playground was divided in two – one for Ashkenazi students, the other for the Sephardim.

This division resulted in predictably irate parents bringing the case before Israel's Supreme Court.

The court ruled that the "discrimination is blatant" and "must cease immediately." Follow-up inspections were inconclusive, as Ashkenazi students mysteriously disappeared into truancy, only to later reappear. This time, the lines of division weren't delineated on ethnic background, but rather on the basis of chassidic and non-chassidic orientation.

Witness again: one school, two streams, two uniforms, two re-cesses, etc. The Supreme Court ruled that the school was engaging in "a disingenuous ruse… It is nothing if not the same as the original, only semantically has the school replaced Ashkenazi and Sephardi with chassidic and non-chassidic," as virtually all Ashkenazi students were chassidic (Slonimer), and all non-chassidic girls were Sephardi.

Still, the school resisted. Impatiently, the Supreme Court imposed a fine of 5,000 shekels (roughly the equivalent of $1,500) for each day thereafter that the school was in contempt of the court order. For any school, this sum would be enormous, but for one such as this, the amount was downright crippling. Indeed, it put its very survival into serious question.

The venerable Rebbe of Slonim cried tears of sorrow. He called out, and as a respected individual, others lent an ear. An urgent meeting of leading Agudath Israel rabbis was convened in the New York area. This is an organization whose members function primarily through consensus. They commiserated with the Rebbe of Slonim and took sides with the school and against the Israeli Supreme Court.

In a subsequent press release, the Agudah said the ruling has no basis in legality, as it is unprecedented that the affairs of a separate and private school should in any way be regulated by anyone other than itself.

In the meantime, the situation continued.

Ours not yet being a perfect world, this problem will nevertheless resolve itself. It will do so in the very way it has throughout Israel and in communities confronted with similar situations. A new, exclusive school will soon be born, one that will be exactly as it wishes to be.

Thus, the immediate problem will – seemingly – be resolved. At the same time, another will be created, for with it another wall of division will be erected.

The Jerusalem of today, for instance, comprises many such walls – virtual walls separating neighbourhoods, shopping centres, schools and, as of late, bus lines. There are too many such walls of segregation being built, rather than bridges of integration.

We can rightly be proud of the kaleidoscope of vibrant Jewish life that has been taking shape and growing before our very eyes in Israel, all in the relatively short period of the past two decades.

We are, nevertheless, at a stage in our maturation that causes us to set up dividing lines in order to cement our own identities.

This will not be forever so. One day, future generations will look back puzzled and bewildered as to why one nation, united under God, felt the need to segregate themselves to this extent.

Lag b'Omer: picnics, bonfires, mysticism

Jewish & Digital
By Mark Mietkiewicz

How can one day remind us of Judaism's links to Kabbalah? Be a time to dance surrounded by a time to mourn? And also be the time for an Israeli pilgrimage that is reminiscent of Woodstock? Lag b'Omer is all of those things. The seven-week period between Passover and Shavuot is a time of semi-mourning, but on the 33rd day, Lag b'Omer, weddings are permitted and the day is celebrated with bonfires and parties. This year, Lag b'Omer falls on Sunday, May 2.

If Lag b'Omer is identified with one person, then it must be Rabbi Shimon Bar Yochai. Rabbi Shimon was a student of Rabbi Akiva whose 24,000 students perished during the Roman conquest of Jerusalem 1,900 years ago because, as the Talmud tells us, "they did not show proper respect for each other." [bit.ly/omer18]

Rabbi Shimon Bar Yochai was one of the very few scholars to survive. The Aish Hatorah website explains how he and his son sought refuge and studied Torah in a cave for 12 years. Rabbi Shimon is believed to have died on Lag b'Omer but just before his death, he revealed to his students the Zohar, Judaism's great kabbalistic work. [bit.ly/omer19]

And the bonfires that mark the day? Ohr Somayach explains that "on the day of Rabbi Shimon's passing, a great light was revealed to his students when he uncovered many of the hidden secrets of the Torah. This was written down in the Zohar (lit. "shining"). The bonfires symbolize the light of the hidden wisdom that Rabbi Shimon bar Yochai revealed on Lag b'Omer." [bit.l0y/omer20]

Some of the biggest bonfires take place in Meron, a small town in northern Israel. Meron is also believed to be the burial place of Rabbi Shimon; so every year, it becomes the focus of a mass pilgrimage. Here's how Judith Fein describes her visit. "Was this Meron or Woodstock?… The town was like an Orthodox carnival. From makeshift booths, vendors sold crafts, religious objects, clothes, books, dates, nuts and soft drinks. Families camped out in tents. Men with long beards asked for charity or offered blessings. According to tradition, if a couple cannot conceive a child, on Lag b'Omer, the man distributes drinks until he has served 18 bottles of wine to cure the barrenness. In the street, young men pressed glasses of wine on us. We drank, of course. It would be rude not to honour their desire for children." [bit.ly/omer21]

As you ponder how to mark the day, you can peek in to dozens of videos of Lag b'Omer bonfires and celebrations, too. [bit.ly/omer23] The Jewish Theological Seminary's Lag b'Omer site focuses on kids. In addition to the history of the day, there are rabbinic tales and essays to spark discussions. [bit.ly/omer28] Over at Orthodox Union, there are links to a Lag b'Omer poem and an explanation why the day is associated with playing bows and arrows. [bit.ly/omer25]

For many Israelis, Lag b'Omer is a great day to get out, have a picnic and throw a few potatoes on the fire. Joni Schockett's menu is a bit more exotic. It includes Stuffed Grape Leaves and Focaccia with Tomatoes, Feta and Garlic. [bit.ly/omer29] Daniel Rogov's picnic boasts Spinach Salad with Honey and Oranges followed by Chicken and Artichoke Salad topped off by Arak Cookies. [bit.ly/omer30] And then there's a Mediterranean Lag b'Omer menu with Sangria, Chilled Almond Soup with Grapes, Broiled Chicken with Garlic Sauce and more. [bit.ly/omer31]

While you're feasting at your picnic, why not break into a rendition of a traditional tune? Lag b'Omer songs may not be as famous as Pesach or Purim melodies but they do exist. So, if you really want to impress the folks over at the next bonfire, brush up on holiday songs from Tunisia, Greece, Iraq and Galicia. [bit.ly/omer32]

Machete attack leaves campus reeling

On Campus
By Justin Dahan

We have all heard the story. It has been plastered all over the news: two Carleton University students, Nick Bergamini and Mark Klibanov, were attacked on April 5 at around 1:45 a.m. after a night on the town in Gatineau Quebec.

The two roommates were walking away from La Volt, a popular nightclub, when they were greeted with shouts of "Zionist" and anti-Semitic slurs. Soon they were surrounded. Things later escalated when one of the assailants grabbed his 12-inch machete out of the trunk of his car and further threatened the young men.

Neither Bergamini nor Klibanov can be sure who was the target of this hate crime. Bergamini, who is not Jewish, is vice-president of student issues for the Carleton Student Association and an avid supporter of Israel. In the past, he has campaigned for Israel advocacy and he has protested against Israeli Apartheid Week, making him a public figure who could have easily been recognized.

Klibanov is an Israeli student who, at the time of the attack, was campaigning for election as president of the Israel Advocacy Committee (IAC) of Carleton and the University of Ottawa, a campaign that he would later win.

Klibanov says he believes the attackers were directing their comments at Bergamini, though he cannot be sure.

"We believe that he recognized Nick or me. I thought the remarks were directed at Nick, but both of us are prominent members of the Jewish community who speak out and support Israel," he said.

Bergamini called the attack "totally unprovoked," and both students believe the act was a hate crime. "They were yelling, 'Jew' and 'Zionist.' It's not like it was motivated out of anger and it came from an argument. We were completely passive the entire time. We were just walking home. It was motivated by what we believe to be a hate crime," he said.

Bergamini was quick to say he does not blame Carleton, but he says he does know that one of the attackers was a Carleton student.

Klibanov agreed, saying, "Carleton campus is safe, security is very good. Heated debates have happened, but nothing that led to violence."

His new role as IAC president will give Klibanov a more active role in working to prevent events like this from arising in the future, and he plans to deal with this actively. He believes that a way to prevent violent and aggressive attacks is to put a more human face on the conflict by "trying to create an atmosphere with open dialogue with Palestinians, because that's the best way to remedy the situation."

He acknowledges that this will not end the debate, but believes that meeting and discussing issues in a safe environment may create more human empathy and discourage violence.

The attack has been reported to Gatineau police, as police spokesperson Isabelle Poirier acknowledged. "We received a call concerning an armed aggression and it's under investigation," she said.

Bergamini and Klibanov are also working alongside campus security trying to recognize who the Carleton student involved in the attack is. So far, they have had no such luck though they remain optimistic.

Jewish service isn't zero-sum

Class Act
By Daniel Held

Last Sunday, thousands of Jewish teenagers took time away from their homework, extracurricular activities and extended sleep schedules to offers a few hours of volunteer service under the banner of J-Serve. Celebrating its fifth year, J-Serve is an annual day of service for Jewish high school students that crosses organizational and denominational lines.

In Toronto, youth movements from across the Jewish spectrum partnered under the aegis of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto to paint a sukkah, volunteer at the Hadassah telethon and assemble tzedakah boxes for Zareinu Educational Centre. Hundreds of miles away, I helped a group of teens distribute lunches to the homeless, clean up a local park and canvass for the ethical treatment of restaurant workers.

It's hard to argue against the value J-Serve. As the organization says, it "provides teens with the opportunity to fulfil the Jewish values of gemilut chasidim, acts of loving kindness, tzedakah, just and charitable giving, and tikkum olam, the responsibility to repair the world." All this while instilling a sense of peoplehood that blurs denominational lines and engaging teens who would usually snub a Jewish event.

J-Serve has filled an important niche.

It's also emblematic of a growing tide of Jewish service learning. In this column, I have previously described the powerful experiences of Jewish students doing disaster relief work in New Orleans, delivering Passover food to Toronto's hungry and volunteering in a rural Mayan village. These experiences have a three-fold purpose: they serve those in need, they teach Jewish values and they offer a forum for the exploration of active Jewish communal living.

Repair the World, a new umbrella organization established by funders such as the Schusterman and Jim Joseph foundations, is investing millions of dollars to make service a defining part of Jewish life.

This mission has come under fire.

In the March edition of Commentary magazine, Jack Wertheimer bemoans the Jewish service learning movement as yet another example of Jewish philanthropic money and volunteer hours being sunk into non-sectarian causes. Wertheimer argues that in the current economic climate, with Jewish organizations and Jewish families devastated by economic hardship, this movement is funnelling resources away from Jewish needs.

Wertheimer recognizes that "Jews in their teens, 20s and 30s are deeply invested in contributing to the world at large… and to get their attention, Jewish organizations must harness their idealism and teach young people that their quest to aid fellow human beings is in fact congruent with the deepest teachings of Judaism."

He asks, however, why this effort to repair the world can't extend to aiding fellow Jews? Instead of Teach for America, we should create teaching fellowships in day schools. Instead of disaster relief in New Orleans, we should seek out those in need in our own community.

This debate between the particularistic and universalistic ideals of service was given voice in Sunday's J-serve experiences. Toronto teens volunteered at a synagogue, Hadassah, JACS and other Jewish organizations. The teens I worked with served the homeless, the parks conservatory, and restaurant workers. I can't say if the points of service were chosen based on convenience, ideology or any number of other factors. The distinction, however, is clear.

Wertheimer is correct is saying that we often gloss over the needs within our own community. Today, an unprecedented number of Jews are living under the poverty line, while day school tuition has reached a critical level and communal institutions are threatened by shrinking budgets.

What Wertheimer doesn't recognize, however, is that service isn't a zero-sum game. The investment in young Jews living, working and learning together to serve those in need – Jewish or not – will, in the long run, pay dividends for the Jewish community and the greater world.

Exhibit highlights photographer's career

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

There are about 65 faces in Toronto's Market Gallery. Some are laughing, some are smiling, some are lost in thought.

Talk-show host Larry King is there. Former Toronto mayor Mel Lastman is there. Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu is there. And they all have one thing in common.

Well, one person.

Al Gilbert.

Gilbert is a Toronto photographer who is known not only for his expert use of light and ability to bring out his subject's personality in a few shots but also for the subjects themselves.

Gilbert, whose career has spanned more than 60 years, has taken photos of hundreds of celebrities and politicians, including U.S. Vice-President Joe Biden, former Israeli prime minister David Ben-Gurion and, one of his personal favourites, Beverly Harvard, the first black female to run a major police department in the United States.

About 65 of Gilbert's photos are on display at the Market Gallery in St. Lawrence Market. Called "Facets of Fame," the exhibit, which launched last week and runs until Sept. 11, explores both Gilbert's career and the evolution of his studio, Gilbert Studios, which was founded by his father, Nathan Gittelmacher, in 1922.

"I ended up in the early years learning to print [photos] and work with glass plates, but [my father] realized early, if my son doesn't learn to see light, he'll go nowhere," Gilbert, who started experimenting with natural light before colour photos came out, said at the exhibit launch.

"I would play with colour pieces of paper and have it reflect... in someone face. In the late '40s... colour hit... it was a miracle."

When he was still in school in the 1950s, Gilbert asked a local radio station if he could photograph the celebrities that the station interviewed and create postcards to sell. The first celebrity he photographed was singer Frank Sinatra. Since then, he has taken shots of hundreds of celebrities, and has donated many of his photos to the Ontario Jewish Archives, which organized the Market Gallery exhibit.

Taking photos of celebrities and political figures is a hobby for Gilbert, who relies on his reputation.

"Once you have that, it's easy to get the rest. You say, 'I'm going to be in Washington, I'm going to photograph an ambassador.'"

One of his more memorable subjects was Ben-Gurion, who visited Toronto in 1960.

Gilbert was tipped off by a Toronto rabbi.

"[He] said, 'Al, get your damn camera and get to the Royal York [Hotel].'" Gilbert said. "When they opened the door and let me in, [I saw] there was a meeting going on... [Ben-Gurion said], 'How many [shots] do you need to take?' I said four, he said, 'You can take five.'"

Looking around at his photos, Gilbert insisted that he has never been intimidated by his subjects.

"I've never been nervous to take a photo. I take charge," Gilbert said. "I prefer doing portraits. It gives me the chance to work with people, to be able to control them, and it's exciting."

Al Gilbert has photographed everyone from talk-show host Larry King to former Israeli prime minister David Ben-Gurion.

The "Facets of Fame" exhibit, which was organized by Ellen Scheinberg and Melinda Richter of the Ontario Jewish Archives, includes a section for prominent Torontonians and prominent Jewish Torontonians Paul Reichmann and Mel Lastman. The exhibit also has a section dedicated to family photos taken by his father.

For Scheinberg, the director of the Ontario Jewish Archives, these are some of her favourites.

"I love the Gilbert Studio photos from the '20s and '30s. His father had a sense of humour," she said, using a photo of Gilbert's mother in a pirate costume as an example. "It's just so charming."

For Esterita Rajsky, who visited the exhibit's launch last week, the photos are more than just headshots.

"He captures expression. They're not just pictures, it's not just a still. They all look as though they're pensive or laughing," she said. "I think he's a fine photographer."

Israel mission part of Ontario government's economic plan

The premier said he chose this year to finally visit the Holy Land because it "fits perfectly with our new agenda, our new five-year [economic] plan called 'Open Ontario.' In order for us to succeed and thrive in this post-recession world, we have to be open to and embrace new possibilities and trade ties. We see Israel as a very bright spot. We think it holds tremendous promise as a trade partner."

As for what business or investment opportunities awaited Ontarians in the West Bank portion of the mission, McGuinty said that part of the trip would be less about strategic provincial investment and more about how Ontario can help "strengthen Palestinian governance, education, small business creation and community development."

McGuinty noted that Diaspora Jews have been key to Israel's success, and Ontario's 200,000 Jews have a real sense of "commitment to Israel. They're helping build their economy as well as ours. And [the province] wants to have a stake in the growth of the Israeli economy. We intend to capitalize on it."

Aside from the business aspect of the trip, McGuinty said he "very much looked forward" to finally being "on the ground to get a better understanding" of Israel geographically, culturally, historically and economically.

He said Jewish MPPs have told him time and again how he'll "never understand" Israel until he visits.

Accompanying McGuinty will be Minister of Economic Development and Trade Sandra Pupatello, and although the premier's office couldn't provide a final list of MPPs who will be going on the trip, published reports said it will include Toronto-area Liberal MPPs Monte Kwinter, David Caplan, David Zimmer and Mike Colle.

Thornhill Tory MPP Peter Shurman – who represents the riding with the highest concentration of Jews in the province – said he's "upset about" being left off the mission. He said he was told only Liberal caucus members would be going.

Teacher/healer took circuitous route to classroom

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Yehudit Shier Weisberg remembers thinking years ago that if she could do things over, she would have studied Jewish education. But having completing two bachelor's degrees and a master of science in behavioural sciences and management, she wasn't about to start anew.

"It's almost like this was meant to be," she said in an interview last week over herbal tea in her plant-filled living room.

A therapeutic touch practitioner, storyteller and ventriloquist, Shier Weisberg also teaches children at two Jewish supplementary schools and adults at the Florence Melton Mini School.

At the Downtown Jewish Community School, Shier Weisberg teaches Grade 5 Jewish studies, and Grade 5/6 Hebrew and prayer. As well, she teaches an eight-week option called Israel Advocacy.

Farther north, at Hebrew's Cool, based at Beth Torah Congregation, she teaches Grade 4 Jewish studies and Hebrew.

Shier Weisberg has been on staff at both schools for about four years.

A Toronto native who attended United Synagogue Day School and grew up at Beth Tzedec Congregation, she spent eight years in Israel, where she studied sociology at the University of Haifa as an undergraduate and obtained her master's degree at the Technion – Israel Institute of Technology before returning to Toronto in 1981 at age 26.

A lesson from the teacher: "I give my students two rules at the beginning of the year: to show derech eretz (respect for others) and to ask questions."

An interest in music – she plays the recorder – led her to study for a second bachelor's degree at the University of Toronto's faculty of music.

She never saw herself going into teaching, but she took on her first recorder student after seeing an ad at the faculty and found she loved the work. Once her own children were in school, she taught recorder at public schools, using her summers to write stories.

It wasn't until after she started to study therapeutic touch 16 years ago that she reconnected with Judaism in a new way.

"I think it was the energy healing that got me thinking differently about so many things we do in Judaism, and I started seeing all these deeper meanings," Shier Weisberg said, her enthusiasm evident in her smile and tone of voice.

"For example," she said, "Havdalah is the original aromatherapy."

And Birchot Hashachar – the blessings that begin the daily morning prayer service – are "almost a recipe" for different elements of energy healing. "It makes you focus on what you have rather than what you don't have. It just puts you in a different frame of mind."

As well, Tashlich – the symbolic casting away of sins – is an "amazing" concept, and similar to some of the healing approaches she has encountered.

In addition to her love of Judaism, Israel and prayer, Shier Weisberg likes to think she brings "a calmness" to the classroom that originates in her healing work. She also facilitates healing services under the auspices of the Jewish Healing Program, run by Jewish Family & Child.

Yehudit Shier Weisberg – who teaches at two Jewish supplementary schools, and is also a ventriloquist – is seen here with "Yossel." [Frances Kraft photo]

Somewhat reticent about being the focus of this article, Shier Weisberg clarified, "What I really want you to put in the article is [for students] to know our history and to be proud of who we are, and to know our moral and our legal rights to the Land of Israel."

University of Waterloo

Jewish studies program celebrates 10th anniversary

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

When Paul Socken first started developing a Jewish studies program at the University of Waterloo 10 years ago, he had one mantra: if you build it, they will come.

"And that's what happened," said Socken, who teaches French Canadian literature at UW. "The interest I knew would always be there. The question was could we get it started?"

In 1993, Socken was approached by Brian Hendley, then dean of arts at UW, with the idea to start a Jewish studies program at the university.

"Back in the early 1990s, neo-Nazis were coming in [to Kitchener] to fundraise," Socken said.

In response to this, Trinity United Church hosted a rally for the Jewish community in Kitchener-Waterloo, which Hendley attended. This is what inspired the idea for a Jewish studies program.

"He was very stirred, very moved. After that, he saw Schindler's List. The two hit him," said Socken, "He called me. I didn't hide the fact that I was Jewish."

As Socken, a former president of Kitchener's Beth Jacob Congregation, started building the program, he found that his biggest problem was funding.

"I had to begin the whole process of starting a program. It really was creating something from nothing," Socken said. "That was the time universities didn't have money to spend."

Socken turned to private philanthropists, who always seemed to have one question.

"People would say, 'Waterloo? Why?,'" he said, adding that, compared with cities such as Toronto, Kitchener-Waterloo had a small Jewish population.

"The uniqueness of Waterloo is the ability to reach out to non-Jewish students. [The Jewish studies program] is important because too often Jews speak to Jews. And that's very nice, that's very good, but it's equally important that the non-Jewish community understand Jewish contributions."

Socken eventually raised enough money to hold a speaker series that focused on Jewish culture and philosophy. About half of the people who attended the lectures were non-Jews.

As word spread about Socken's initiative, he was able to raise enough money to start an official program in the religious studies department, which could be taken as a minor, in 2000.

This is where James Diamond came in.

Paul Socken

James Diamond

Diamond was a lawyer with a PhD in Medieval Jewish thought. But he never planned on teaching.

"I did it for myself," he said of his PhD. "Law was a profession. That [Jewish studies] I loved."

Still, when he learned about the new program, he decided to take the leap.

"I figured you don't get many chances. I applied and I fit the bill."

When developing the program's courses, Diamond, who is UW's Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Chair of Jewish Studies and the program's only full-time faculty member, made one thing clear.

"Originally, when I got the job, I told them I wouldn't teach about the Holocaust. People have started to identify Jewish identity with the Holocaust," he said. "It's something we didn't contribute to the world."

Instead, Diamond wanted to focus on Jewish philosophy and culture, but there was too much of a demand for Holocaust education from the students, so he compromised.

"[I teach] how Judaism has formulated a response to innocent suffering," he said, adding that about 25 per cent of the content of his courses is about the Holocaust.

Because Diamond teaches many non-Jewish students, he had to tailor the curriculum of the program accordingly, which included exploring the link between Christianity and Judaism.

"I try to cater the courses not as selling religion, but rather as academic courses. I'm not here to make Jews out of you. That's not my job," Diamond said. "My job is to inform them and have them really appreciate the central contributions Judaism has made to the world."

Diamond and Socken, who is retiring this summer, are hoping to expand the program to focus more on Israel. Socken's goal is to work with universities in Israel to create an exchange program, as well as to create more endowments, which would allow professors to teach courses on contemporary Jewish issues.

Ryerson AEPi stripped of status

By MICHAEL ISENBERG
Special to The CJN

Alpha Epsilon Pi at Ryerson University is finishing the year off strongly: it has 25 members, it just finished a bone marrow drive and it's planning an end-of-the-year party.

But only a few months ago, the fraternity almost disappeared from campus completely after the chapter there was stripped of its status for only having four members.

"Things just went downhill," said Adam Vogler, a third-year member of Ryerson's AEPi outpost, called Pi Rho.

"Guys start[ed] getting fed up with things – just not liking the way AEPi was being run – and dropped out. Our pledge master left and we had no one to fill his void [for recruiting]."

Founded in 2004, it was projected that Pi Rho would be popular. According to Vogler, AEPi alumni hoped that being in the heart of downtown Toronto at a rapidly growing university would help it become one of the more recognizable chapters in North America.

But having few members and no attention-grabbing events made gaining traction difficult.

"Our biggest issue was lacking creativity," Vogler said. "We were big on tradition, but all we did was what had been done – no new events, no innovations to old events. Tradition's great, but so is blending it with the new."

By December 2009, Pi Rho was down to just four members and AEPi International took away the chapter's status.

Programs continue despite declining membership

"That was a huge blow for us," Vogler said. "But they said they wanted to see us start again and see us succeed."

With its status stripped, AEPi at Ryerson is now officially referred to as a colony, a probationary state in which it functions as a regular chapter, but receives no aid from the international fraternity.

Colony president Jamie Levine said he's not concerned about the rebuilding phase.

"Most people have an image in their heads of a stereotype frat and stereotype frat guys, but we're not like that," said Levine, a third-year business management student. "We're going to show everyone we're better than that. We like to party, sure. But we're leaders, activists, caregivers. We're the new AEPi at Ryerson."

Levine, like half the current colony members, was recruited by Ryerson AEPi alumni in January, who lured new members in with the prospect of becoming founding fathers of a revitalized chapter.

"It was a chance to become a Jewish leader for the Jewish community," Levine said.

Since January, Pi Rho's membership has grown to 25, and the executive board is optimistic about continued growth next year, banking on attracting people through innovative events.

Levine said an annual event is in the works for Ryerson to call its own, similar to the University of Western Ontario chapter's Rock For Research breast cancer initiative.

In addition, there will be more social events to raise money and interest.

Its next event, Lights Out, on April 30, will be a party where participants receive special markers and will be encouraged to draw on each other. The markers can only be seen under black light, which will be turned on at midnight.

"This will be awesome," Vogler said. "It will put AEPi at Ryerson on the map."

ANYWHERE ELSE
THIS WOULD JUST BE A STONE.

BUT THIS IS THE WESTERN WALL

It holds the prayers, hopes and dreams of the Jewish people, just as it has for centuries. Only here, in Jerusalem, can you place your own message in the Wall. Only here can you walk the cobbled streets King David and our ancient ancestors walked. Come home to Israel, where the history that makes us who we are still lives.

There's a little bit of Israel in all of us. Come find the Israel in you.

Mezuzah-bearing cabbie back in court

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Cote St. Luc cab driver Arieh Perecowicz finally got his day – actually, two days – in Municipal Court last Wednesday and Thursday in his lone crusade to overturn six tickets now totalling more than $1,600 for carrying a photo of the late Lubavitcher Rebbe, two mezuzot and other verboten items in his west-end taxi.

But incredibly, the case is not likely to be resolved until at least a year from now, Perecowicz, 66, told The CJN after court adjourned April 22.

One day of the trial took place last fall, and two additional days were already set aside for June, ostensibly to finish up the case.

But last Thursday, Municipal Court judge Dominique Joly scheduled an additional two days in December, another two in January 2011, and yet another for next April.

Perecowicz, who has been driving a taxi for 44 years and is handling his own defence, said Joly set aside so many dates because at least one day will be needed to question each of the inspectors who ticketed him.

He said Joly was "furious" on Wednesday after she asked the parties to sit down and try to resolve their dispute in order to avoid a trial, only to have them return 90 minutes later and ask her to clarify her instructions.

The trial then proceeded.

Received six tickets for displaying religious items

Perecowicz's problems date back to December 2006, when he was issued his first ticket for allegedly breaking Section 98 of the city's taxi bylaw prohibiting taxis from carrying "objects or inscriptions" that are "not needed" to operate the vehicle.

Besides the religious items, Perecowicz also had a poppy, a Canadian flag, photographs and newspaper clippings in his taxi.

The prosecution's case is that Perecowicz was fined for breaking the bylaw, that the objects in his car posed a hazard to passengers in the event of an accident, and, as one inspector testified last fall, that his cab was "dirty."

Perecowicz's defence is that, while he's willing to keep his cab cleaner, the regulation is unconstitutional because it infringes on his religious freedom.

He's also alleging the tickets were issued in retaliation for his protesting the prevalence of unlicensed taxis in the city. No other cabbie, he is also arguing, has ever been issued a ticket for breaking Section 98, even though most taxi drivers carry personal items in their vehicles.

Perecowicz also has filed a complaint with the Quebec Human Rights Commission, but he said that body won't address his case until the trial is over.

So far, Perecowicz said, he is satisfied with how the proceedings are progressing.

"I feel very well," he said.

A TIME TO CELEBRATE

A group of children dance the hora at the Yom Ha'atzmaut rally in Montreal last week. Spontaneous horas, chants of "Am Yisrael chai" and blaring klezmer music commingled with cacophonous kids and the celebratory chants of everyone who walked to Place du Canada from Phillips Square at the Israel Independence Day community rally organized by the Jewish Unity Partnership. According to organizers, 13,000 were at the rally, some of them bused in from Jewish schools.

יום הזכרון- ישראל בת 62

לפני שנתיים הגעתי ארצה ישר ליום העצמאות, אבל כזה שנים רבות לא יצא לי להיות בארץ ביום הזכרון. אני כותב את הדברים האלה באמצע יום הזכרון, דקות ספורות אחרי הצפירה, זו ללא ספק ליבת החוויה הישראלית, חוויה קשה ויחודית שזר יכול להבין אותה אך לא להרגישה. אמש הייתי בעצרת הזכרון של עיר ילדותי, קריית ארבע, שלא נכחתי בה שנים רבות. עזבתי את העצרת הזו כשהיו לקריית ארבע מאות מעשרים נופלים, ואתמול נכשכה הרשימה ליותר מכאה, כחלק מעשרים ושניים אלף ישראלים שאיבדו את חייהם במערכות אימה, בצה"ל ומחוצה לו, חזי מסטר מדהים, ואין ישראלי שלא נגע במשפחתי הקרובה או הרחוקה יותר.

למה מתכוונת סין

מנהיג סין נפגש עם אובאמה ובתום הפגישה הודיע הנשיא האמריקאי בסיפוק שסין תתמוך באמצעדות נגד איראן. לא נקפו שעות אחדות והנשיא הסיני חזר לביתו והודיע שהוא נגד המלחמה. ב"קול ישראל" ראיתי את שגריר ישראל לשעבר בסין שגיחך בקול רם על זה שהאמריקאים אינם מבינים ש"כן" של סינים אינו כן בהכרח, ישהם אינם אנשים ישרים כמו שהאמריקאים מאמינים.

חשבתי לעצמי שגם מנהיגי ישראל אינרים לאמריקאים כל מיני "כן" בעניין פשרות עם הפלשתינאים, ויתך דקות אומרים דברים הפוכים בארץ, ואחר כך מודעים ש"לא הבינו אותם ויסלחו את דבריהם".

לאחרונה דרשה שרת החוץ קלינטון מישראל "יותר כנות בשיחה הסכסוך המדיני", ללמדני שהיא מבינה היטב עם מי יש לה עסק.

די מגיחך שאנשי ממשלה ישראליים סברים שהם נחשבים בעיני העולם לדמוקרטיה מערבית מוצלחת. אין ספק-ישראל היא דמוקרטיה, אחת היחידות באזורה התיכון (לא היחידה, כמו שאנחנו אוהבים לומר- טורקיה גם היא דמוקרטית), אבל עוד הדרך רבה.

ענת קם ועיתון הארץ

חיילת בשירות סדיר נבזה בזמן שירותה מאות מסמכים סודיים ומסרה למי בלאו, כתב עיתון הארץ. כתב עיתון הארץ סירב להסגיר את מקורות המידע שלו אבל השב"כ זיהה אותה ללא עזרתו. הוא נתון עכשיו לחסרנות. החיילת, שעומדת לפלוח שנים רבות במלא, "שתירה" אותו מסודיות, בתקוה להמתיק את גזר דינה. ואני תרשב לעצמי: לעזאזל, מה זכותו של כתב עיתון, או כל אזרח, להחזיק מסמכים סודיים, מה עוד שהוא יודע שהם נובבים?

אם אני כרשה מחזיק בביתי מסמכים רפואיים של חולה-אני עובר עבירה המודה, ואם אני קונה אופניים נובבים אני עובר עבירה פלילית.

לא מלא שהכתב יושב בלונדון ומקוה שתעמדת החזרת המסמכים יחסכו ממנו כתב אשמה חמור.

ויסי הנפש שמנסים להסדר את ענת קם ללוחמת צדק- חפשו לכם אילן אחר. זהי עבירה פלילית נמו, בכל מדינה בעולם. והמעניה שהיא "גילתה" פעילות בלתי חוקרות של הרינה פלשתינאים בניגוד להוראת בג"ץ- נבדקה על ידי היועץ המשפטי מזו ונשללה על ידו. אבל שישאר בינינו.

Govt. re-introduces act to aid victims of terror

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Legislation re-introduced in the House of Commons by the federal government last week is a response to calls from victims of terrorism who seek justice, Public Safety Minister Vic Toews said after presenting the bill.

The government is "demonstrating leadership in the global fight against terrorism," Toews said in a statement. "Perpetrators and supporters of terrorism must be held accountable for their actions."

The Justice for Victims of Terrorism Act, if passed, would "amend the State Immunity Act to lift immunity [from Canadian prosecution] for states listed by Canada as supporters of terrorism," the government says. It would also allow victims to claim and recover damages from those who perpetrate or support terror, retroactive to 1985.

This date was chosen to reflect the bombing of Air India Flight 182 on June 23, 1985, which killed 329 people.

This is the second time the Conservative government has brought the legislation forward. Last June, Bill C-35 was tabled in the House by Conservative MP Peter Van Loan, and underwent first reading. The bill died when Parliament was prorogued early this year. Its content remains unmodified.

Eric Vernon, Canadian Jewish Congress director of government relations and international affairs, said his organization is pleased with Bill C-35's re-introduction.

"We're supportive of the government taking this position and bringing this bill back. We believe that victims of terrorism should have the right to sue the sponsors of terrorism," he said.

He noted that Bill C-35 was not the only bill put forward on this subject and said Congress would also look closely at others.

Vernon was referring to private member's Bill C-408, also introduced last June, by Liberal MPs Irwin Cotler and Bob Rae.

As a private member's bill, it was unaffected by prorogation of Parliament and thus remained alive in the House.

Last year, Cotler announced his bill as a contrast to the Justice for Victims of Terrorism Act, saying the government's bill did "not adequately protect the rights of victims."

The Liberal legislation features most of the same legal amendments as Bill C-35, but "does not shield itself behind an escape clause that renders it completely ineffective until foreign states are named on a case-by-case basis. Such an approach politicizes justice," Cotler told the House in introducing the bill last year.

When asked at the time to clarify the major difference between the bills, Cotler's office told The CJN the Liberal initiative would not require the government to actively name a foreign state to have its immunity from Canadian prosecution lifted. Rather, it would be "automatically" lifted during a plaintiff's court proceedings, freeing the government from the possibility of having to label other states as terrorist sponsors.

Last week, Cotler said he was "pleased" by the re-introduction of the government's bill and acknowledged that both his bill and C-35 share the same goals and spirit.

"This is not a partisan issue… Our bills share two objectives: one, that victims of terror deserve to have a right of civil redress in Canadian courts. Two, we need to amend the State Immunity Act that precludes this right of civil remedy and shields the state-sponsors of terror," he said.

Cotler said he hopes that should C-35 go to committee review after second reading in the House, a pre-ordained Canadian list of terrorist states could be dropped from its requirements.

Reached by phone last week, Peter Kent, minister of state for foreign affairs, said he believed Bill C-35 would have all-party support. The government hopes to fast-track the legislation, he added.

"We believe there needs to be [a list of terrorist states]. Otherwise, some of Canada's allies could be harassed by inappropriate… specious lawsuits against [states] that by most measures, Canadians wouldn't consider supporters of terrorism."

Cotler said he understood the impetus for the government to want to protect its allies – such as the United States and Israel – from such lawsuits, but said in his bill, this issue is accounted for with states that have extradition treaties with Canada in place.

"You won't have frivolous lawsuits against those countries, because victims of terrorism will already be able to seek redress in those democratic countries," he said.

Kent acknowledged that if the government's bill goes to committee after second reading there is the "potential for changes to be made."

When the bill was first introduced, the government cautioned plaintiffs that if the defendant has assets in jurisdictions other than Canada, they would have to "follow the process of the foreign state for recognition of the judgment and subsequently take necessary measures to execute the judgment in that country."

In related news, last Friday Justice Minister and Attorney General Rob Nicholson introduced the Combating Terrorism Act.

The government says the legislation – which was originally created by the Anti-terrorism Act in 2001 and expired after five years – would "seek to amend the Criminal Code to reinstate an investigative hearings power. This would give a judge the power… to compel someone with information about a terrorism offence… to appear before him or her."

The announcement concluded a series of bills re-tabled by the government during the National Victims of Crime Awareness Week.

Winnipeg book tells stories of Holocaust survivors

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — A hero is generally defined as someone who shows courage under fire or risks his life to save another

But, notes Shelley Faintuch, the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg's community relations director, a hero can also be someone who exhibits courage and self-sacrifice in hopeless situations, someone who struggles on despite the odds and endures

"Our parents who survived the Holocaust came to this country with nothing," said Faintuch, a child of survivors. "They had no money, little or no family, little education and no knowledge of English. Yet, they persisted. They made sacrifices for their children – we who couldn't understand why our homes were different from our friends' homes or why our parents didn't share their stories or their nightmares with us.

"They took care of us and protected us. They were true heroes and this evening is dedicated to them."

Faintuch was speaking at the April 15 launch of the book Voice of Winnipeg Holocaust Survivors, the culmination of years of effort to record the stories and experiences of Holocaust survivors who came to Winnipeg after the war. And attendance was such that a second room at the Asper Jewish Community Campus had to be opened and the program relayed to the overflow crowd via live feed.

The evening consisted of a reading by Voices of Winnipeg Holocaust Survivors editor Belle Millo (who is also a child of Holocaust survivors), as well as greetings and remarks from representatives of three levels of government (and Winnipeg South Centre Liberal MP Anita Neville), representation from the (largely Jewish) General Monash Branch of the Royal Canadian Legion and a medley of Yiddish songs from the ghettos sung by Jane Enkin, with musical support by Eli Herscovitch, Ariel Posen and Jeff Pressaff.

The origins of the book – which records the stories of 73 Holocaust survivors living in Winnipeg (although some have passed away in recent years) – goes back to the early 1990s, when representatives of Winnipeg's Holocaust education committee and the federation's Holocaust awareness committee began collecting memoirs of Holocaust survivors.

"Phyllis Laveman, a member of our committee, suggested that we invite Belle Millo to join," recalled Lil Zentner, a past chair of the committee. (Zentner's late husband, Hersh, was an early leader in Holocaust education in the city's public school system.)

"Belle took over the project of collecting survivors' stories with the intention of producing a book. She worked tirelessly with unbelievable passion and without seeking any compensation. We are forever grateful for her selfless dedication and strong determination to bring this book to life."

In her remarks, Millo briefly described her own parents' – Samuel and Sylvia Jarniewski's – stories of survival.

"My parents met in Canada after the war and rebuilt their lives together," Millo said. "But they remained haunted by their losses and their experiences. My mother suffered from depression. Even as a small child, I knew that I had to protect her."

She remembered her father having a lust for life, but frequently crying out at night.

"My own life has been defined by my parents' suffering," she said. "At the same time, I was inspired by their will to survive."

Millo read one excerpt from the book – an account by the late Jeannette Perlov about trying to save her two-year-old son from the Nazis.

Perlov recounted that the Nazis discovered where she and her son were hiding and demanded that she give up the little boy. She refused to let him go or plead for mercy. She was eventually rendered unconscious by several rifle butts to her head. When she awoke, she was in the arms of her husband (who had been at work in a bakery) and their son, David, was gone. The Gestapo had come for the children.

Millo noted that the book was completed with the support of the Jewish Foundation of Manitoba, the Freeman Family Holocaust Education Centre, the Claims Conference and donations from the community at large.

She also recognized Gustavo Rymberg, a former Winnipegger now living in Toronto, who designed the book and the cover.

Millo also noted that Manitoba's department of education is distributing copies of the book in 450 high schools throughout the province.

Jewish archives seeks WWII veterans to interview

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

The Ontario Jewish Archives is looking for Jewish war veterans in the Toronto area who served in the Canadian services and other Allied forces during World War II so it can record their stories as part of the Historica-Dominion Institute's federally-funded Memory Project: Stories of the Second World War.

The archives – a department of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto – is partnering with the Institute, the Royal Canadian Legion's General Wingate branch 256, as well as the Jewish Canadian Military Museum and the Canadian Jewish War Veterans for an event being held May 13 from 10 to 4 p.m. at the Lipa Green Centre. The interview day is part of a Dominion Institute project funded by the Canadian government.

The Historica-Dominion Institute will provide the interviewers, and organizers hope to conduct up to 40 interviews that day. The institute will keep the audio interviews, and copies will be provided both to the archives and the veterans.

Ellen Scheinberg

As well, the archives and the institute are seeking artifacts from the veterans. The OJA is interested in acquiring items, while the institute will scan and keep them in digital form for its online archives.

Items of interest "run the gamut from medals to photographs and documents," said OJA director Ellen Scheinberg. "It could be Swiss army knives, shoes, clothing, implements, or weapons, diaries – if they kept a diary, certificates, dog tags.

"We do have some artifacts," Scheinberg said. "We're hoping to expand our holdings, because UJA Federation is planning a Canadian Jewish museum, and ultimately we'd like to acquire more material."

The archives does not have any interviews with Canadian Jewish War veterans, and the Canadian War Museum only has one, according to Scheinberg. The Jewish Canadian Military Museum in Toronto conducted "about a handful," she added.

Of almost 17,000 Canadian Jewish men and women who served in World War II, only about 50 to 100 have been interviewed, Scheinberg told The CJN. Some of those interviews are in museums in Manitoba and Alberta, she said.

"Due to the paucity of interviews and the fact that the youngest veterans would likely in their early '80s, we felt that we couldn't afford to wait any longer to record their important stories," Scheinberg said. "I think it's an important partnership for us. We've been wanting to do this for a long time. There were so few interviews with veterans. It's so crucial to get their stories as soon as possible."

Proportionally, the Jewish community had one of the higher rates of enlistment during World War II – one-fifth of the adult population at the time, compared to one-eleventh of Canadian adults overall, said Davida Aronovitch of the Historica-Dominion Institute and communications co-ordinator for the Memory Project.

The institute – which already has at least five Jewish veterans among approximately 400 veterans represented in its digital archives – has also reached out to ethnic groups including Chinese Canadians, who, "like Jews, faced certain forms of discrimination, and chose to serve for Canada," Aronovitch said.

Alex Levin, of the Jewish War Veterans of Canada, told The CJN that it is "very important to keep a legacy of Jews who were participating."

There are currently between 100 and 150 paid members of the organization, Levin said. Others have passed away, he added.

As well, he noted, there is a separate organization called the Canadian Association of World War II Veterans from the Soviet Union, with a membership of almost 300, most of whom are Jewish.

Murray Jacobs, president of the Legion's 135-member Wingate branch, plans to be interviewed as part of the event. A veteran of the Canadian army, he ran an instrument shop and spent four years overseas.

"It's important for history to know that the Jews participated," said Jacobs, who is turning 90 in May. As well, he noted, those who went overseas went because they had volunteered to do so. "If these stories are not told, nobody will know."

Improv comic celebrates the underdog

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Isaac Kessler is an underdog. And he's OK with that.

Kessler, 26, was rejected from 16 sports teams in high school, put on academic warning at York University and wasn't accepted to York's theatre program.

But he never gave up.

"I'm pretty driven. People say 'No.' I say 'I'm gonna keep trying,'" Kessler said.

That's how he ended up in Second City's conservatory program, an intense improv training ground.

It's also how he started performing at Impatient Theatre Company and Bad Dog Theatre, two Toronto improv companies, and how he created a two-man show that he'll be taking to the world's largest arts festival this summer in Edinburgh.

Isaac Kessler

Kessler wasn't supposed to be an improv comedian. In fact, he wasn't supposed to be any kind of comedian at all. Originally, he went to York to study information technology, but he was put on academic warning during his first year.

"I'm not a school person," he said, adding that he tried switching into York's theatre program several years later, but was rejected.

In his second year at York, he started taking fine arts courses such as music, where he learned West African drumming.

Isaac Kessler, right, performs with Ken Hall in their sketch comedy 2 Man No Show. [Kate Millet photo]

"It was the first time my creative side came out," he said.

Eventually, Kessler took a drama course, where he got his first taste of improv.

"That was the best," he said. "At the surface level, [improv] is just being able to make people laugh. That's something that's really important for me – bringing joy to other people."

It didn't take long for Kessler to become addicted. In 2006, he moved downtown and started taking classes at Second City.

"I went to my first class, and I fell in love. It was three hours of heaven," he said. "Those three hours, that's how life should be lived. There's total support, no judgment. There's no negativity."

One of the first things he learned about improv was to never say no.

"The idea is to say yes to everyone... All mistakes are gifts, because you can do no wrong in improv. Everything you do is right," he said. "On stage, you make a move, I make a move. It's so freeing. It's what we try to be in life."

After finishing all the course levels at Second City, he decided to audition for its conservatory program.

"Anyone can take the A to E [levels at Second City], but the conservatory program is special," he said. "You're with the same people for a year and a half. They're training you to create a Second City show."

Around the same time, Kessler also started taking improv classes at Impatient Theatre and Bad Dog Theatre.

"The Impatient Theatre Company blew me away. That was a huge moment for me. [I thought] I don't know what this is yet, but this is what I need.'"

He soon realized that his love of improv was based partly on the connections he's made with his fellow performers.

"My teammates I perform with, you create friendships and connections. I have 10-year friendships and I have friends from improv who I've known for two years. I'm closer to them," he said. "You have to have total trust with [other performers]."

Kessler continued taking classes and eventually started teaching and performing at Impatient Theatre and performing at Bad Dog Theatre and Vanguard Comedy Theatre.

"[Improv] is extremely terrifying. That's why I love it. It's the ultimate risk-taking... You have to follow the fear," he said. "You've got to be vulnerable in comedy... being able to be vulnerable on stage is what connects us to being human."

According to Kessler, the art of improv is unique, because of the constant state of change that defines each performance.

"[People] say improv is recyclable. It's not recyclable. Improv is like coal. You crush it and it becomes a diamond," he said, smiling proudly at his analogy. "I like that."

In 2008, Kessler's love of improv took him to the Melbourne International Comedy Festival, where he performed with the sketch troupe Toronto on Top.

"It was incredible. It was one of those big moments. I had to write a sketch show in three months," he said. "It was a big money-loser, but what an incredible confidence-builder."

After travelling to Australia, Kessler was talked into applying to perform at the Toronto Fringe Festival in 2009. In January of that year, he was chosen to participate.

Improv comedian Isaac Kessler, right, performs with fellow comedian Ken Hall in 2 Man No Show.

"It was this moment of fear and excitement. Now it's like, 'You have to do something,'" he said.

Kessler enlisted the help of Ken Hall, a fellow improv comedian who he met at Second City.

"[Hall's] 4-foot-9, Scottish and one of the best in the city," Kessler said. "He's one of my best friends. We have a lot in common. We're the underdogs."

This realization was the basis for the show they ended up writing together called 2 Man No Show, which is a mixture of sketch comedy and improv.

In the show, Hall falls in love with a chair, Kessler re-enacts the film Jurassic Park in five minutes, and the two performers do an African drum version of Beyoncé's All the Single Ladies.

"We sold out the last five shows. It was this crazy buzz non-stop last summer," Kessler said, adding that the show was chosen as a Fringe favourite by audiences.

Kessler and Hall took the show to the FRIGID New York Festival and the San Francisco SketchFest, and they'll be performing it at the New York City SketchFest in June and the Edinburgh Fringe Festival, the biggest arts festival in the world, this summer.

"It's a pretty crazy show... I wear spandex," Kessler said of 2 Man No Show. "It feels great to have something you're proud of."

Kessler and Hall will be performing 2 Man No Show at Second City in Toronto on May 16. For tickets, call the Second City box office at 416-343-0011, or go to www.secondcity.com. For more information about Kessler and the show, visit www.2mannoshow.com.

Fundraiser for Fanconi research planned

Compiled by CJN Staff

The 10th annual fundraiser for Fanconi Canada is being held May 2 at the Terrace Banquet Centre in Vaughan.

The organization raises funds to support medical research into Fanconi anemia (FA) Type C, a potentially fatal genetic disease that's more prevalent among Ashkenazi Jews than other ethnic groups.

The event was founded by Richmond Hill lawyer Karen Granofsky when she learned that the son of a co-worker had FA.

She enlisted the help of co-workers at Lawyers Professional Indemnity Company (Lawpro) and organized a buffet dinner and silent auction at a comedy club that raised $18,000.

Organized now by Granofsky, event co-chair Jack Daiter and a group of co-workers, the fundraiser attracts 400 guests from Toronto's legal and business community and has raised more than $500,000.

Most research projects undertaken by Fanconi Canada have been in partnership with the Canadian Institutes for Health Research, which matches Fanconi Canada's contributions dollar for dollar.

FA occurs equally in males and females, and although it is found in all ethnic groups, approximately one out of 89 Ashkenazi Jews is a carrier for the specific subtype "C." Though considered primarily a blood disease, it can affect all systems of the body. Many patients eventually develop acute myeloid leukemia.

Lorne Shelson, president of Fanconi Canada, whose son has FA, said that the organization's goal is to find effective treatment, and eventually a cure, for FA. "With the support of our sponsors, donors, board members and volunteers, the Ontario fundraiser has catapulted this 'kitchen table' charity into one that funds hundreds of thousands of dollars for research, without any paid staff," he said.

The event includes live jazz by musician and lawyer Ron Davis, backed by bassist/vocalist Brandi Disterheft, guitarist James Robertson and drummer Morgan Childs.

For more information, or to buy tickets, visit www.curefanconi.org.

Need for kidney donations highlighted

Compiled by CJN Staff

Friends of a 22-year-old man in need of a kidney transplant are organizing a second event to raise awareness of his plight.

Almost four months after Lori Palatnik, an author and Jewish educator formerly of the Village Shul, spoke at Aish HaTorah in December about donating her kidney to a woman she had never met, Rabbi Ephraim Simon, a Chabad rabbi from New Jersey is coming to talk about his own kidney donation to a stranger.

As a result of Rabbi Simon's donation, 15 others in his community have donated a kidney.

The young man in Toronto still hasn't found a kidney and continues to experience medical complications while on dialysis five times a week.

This latest event, organized by Chabad communities of the Greater Toronto Area to raise awareness of kidney disease and donation, is being held April 29 at Chabad Lubavitch in Thornhill. Cocktails begin at 7:30, followed by Rabbi Simon's talk. For information, call Renewal Toronto, 416-628-7633, or visit www.renewal.org.

Jewish adventures in Asia

By MASADA SIEGEL
Special to cjnews.com

Life has a funny way of working out, at least that is what I keep telling myself, over and over again. But none-the-less I was scared, as I was leaving for a working holiday in Asia and flying to China, solo.

You might think someone who has by choice stepped out of perfectly good airplanes at 12,000 feet in New Zealand, raced in the Olympic Bob run with the Swiss Olympic silver medalist at breakneck speeds (1612 meters in 49 seconds) in St Moritz, Switzerland and dared to be seen in a bikini having a swim lesson with the all time great Olympic gold medalist Jason Lezak that nothing would faze me.

Wrong! Not only was I flying to China, I was spending Passover in Hong Kong and I did not know a soul.

Thousands walk for MS cure

Compiled by CJN Staff

More than 22,000 people across Ontario supported finding a cure to multiple sclerosis by participating in the April 18 MS Walk.

Taking part with friends, family or co-workers, participants walked and wheeled routes from two to 10 kilometres, united by community spirit and the common goal to end MS.

Over $5.1 million raised

More than $5.1 million in pledges was raised, with proceeds funding research into the cause and cure of multiple sclerosis and providing services for locals with MS and their families.

"The MS Walk is truly a community event and its success is due to the commitment of communities across Ontario," said Yves Savoie, president and CEO of the MS Society of Canada and president of the MS Society's Ontario Division.

"We are extremely grateful for the support of each of our participants, donors, sponsors and volunteers, whose involvement today has helped us move closer to ending MS."

Aurora resident Leah Tallon-Sinclair took part in the MS Walk in Newmarket, heading up a team of 25 friends and family members that raised almost $20,000 in pledges. For Tallon-Sinclair, who was diagnosed with MS seven years ago, the walk is a reminder of both the impact of the disease and the support of the community.

"Until I was diagnosed myself, I didn't realize how common MS was," she said. "Many of the symptoms of MS aren't obvious.

"One of the special things about the MS Walk is that so many people seem to have been touched by multiple sclerosis in some way. Every walker is supporting someone even if they don't know them personally. It makes me feel thankful for people's generosity — and extremely hopeful that a cure will be found soon."

The MS Society of Canada's next fundraising event is the MS Carnation Campaign, which takes place from May 6 to 8 and helps kick off MS Awareness Month across Canada. For more information visit www.mssociety.ca or call 1-800-268-7582.

Preparing for charity ride season

Compiled by CJN Staff

The time has come for riders to begin training for ride season – and motivating yourself is easier than you think. Charity ride season, which runs from May until October, provides the perfect motivator for cyclists to get moving in 2010. With the right preparation and training, participants can pedal their way to the finish line for their cause of choice.

Among the over 30 charity events surrounding the GTA this year is the Zareinu Moveathon Ride for Kids with Special Needs along the Niagara escarpment on June 27.

Zareinu Moveathon set for June 27

"Cycling is easy to start and even easier to get hooked on," said Lou Orzech, who first started riding by joining the Moveathon in 2007. "I worked my way up from the 50 kilometre to 100 kilometre, and then the 162.5 kilometre over three years. Now I'm riding at least four times a week."

Here are some tips for riders, new and returning, looking to tackle the charity ride season:

Preparation:

A good rider starts with a good bike. Starter bikes can cost as little as $200, but comfort is key. Be sure to try more than one bike before settling and remember to purchase the necessary riding gear, like a helmet, pads and a lock, to go with it. The investment will pay off in spades.

Create a training program that works for you. Creating a program and schedule is the best way to keep track of progress as well as keep you on target for the ride of your choice.

Join group rides to get you going. Ask friends, colleagues or avid riders for groups with which to train. If that comes up short, spinning classes are excellent ways to meet fellow riders and stay on target.

Training:

Pace yourself. If you are new to the sport or returning after the winter break, remember that pacing is the key to finding longevity and avoiding injury. Pushing yourself well beyond your limits can put an extra strain on your body.

Remember best practices. If you are training for a one-day ride, your longest practice ride should be 10 to 14 days before the event.

Keep your goal in mind. Be sure to not exceed 75 per cent of the length of the planned ride the week before your event. This will keep your muscles relaxed for the big day.

Allow for recovery time. Plan a short ride, or a rest day, following the high mileage training rides. These rides should be at least a quarter of the length of the long ride and done at a leisurely pace.

The Zareinu Moveathon Ride for Kids with Special Needs takes place on June 27 starting at Bishop Reding Secondary School, complete with breakfast, showers, rest stops, Louis Garneau cycling jersey, celebratory barbeque and post-ride massages.

Training rides are available through the Moveathon, and complimentary spinning is available for all registered riders through Embody Fitness Clubs and Sensible Fitness. The ride raises critical funds for state-of-the art treatment for kids with special needs at the Zareinu Educational Centre www.zareinu.org/ in Toronto. For more event information on training rides, maps and registration visit www.moveathon.com or call 416-661-1800 ext. 228.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Spice of Life

Are memories made of chickpeas and sesame seeds?

By SYBIL KAPLAN
Special to The CJN

Over the past 40 years, there have been fervent discussions about whether there is an Israeli cuisine, and I sit on the side of those who say yes. It has been a developing idea over years. One thing about which there has been little debate, however, is whether there are Israeli street foods.

On any day, you can walk down the Ben Yehuda Mall or King George Street or through the Machane Yehuda shuk (market), and it's easy to see Israelis still love their "typical" snack foods – schwarma (rotisserie-grilled turkey with lamb fat, slivered and stuffed into pita), falafel (deep fried chickpea balls), hummus (chickpea dip), techinah (sesame seed paste) and pita (pocket bread).

Chickpeas, which are among the oldest cultivated plants, are native to northern Persia. A staple of peasant cooking and a source of cheap protein, they have been in the diets of Jews of the Mediterranean and North Africa for centuries.

They form the basis of two of Israel's street foods—hummus which also has tahini – also called techinah – garlic and lemon; and falafel, for which the chickpeas are ground and combined with other ingredients before being formed into balls and deep fried.

Falafel

Once when I was doing research, I read that falafel originated among the Christian Coptic priests of Egypt, who created the dish to be eaten during Lent when meat could not be eaten. In Claudia Roden's A Book of Middle Eastern Food, she confirms this, calling falafel "one of Egypt's national dishes." In Egypt, it is known as ta'amia, which Roden describes as "patties or rissoles made from a dried, white broad bean, splendidly spiced and flavoured, and deep fried in oil."

Being Egyptian born, she offers the recipe with white broad beans, Spanish onions or spring onions, garlic, parsley, cumin, coriander, baking powder, salt and pepper.

In The Book of Jewish Food, Roden says that Yemenites who came to the Holy Land before 1948 were the first to sell falafel. They made them with chickpeas, sold them in the streets and brought them to the settlements. Then the Romanians started making them, only less spicy. All vendors offer the charif spicy sauces as optional.

Sherry Ansky also writes of this origin in her book The Food of Israel, adding that "the major difference between Egyptian and Israeli falafel is the bean," referring to the flat white beans that Egyptians use.

She says Arabs introduced falafel to Israel, and the Israelis were the first people to substitute chickpeas for the white beans.

Ansky's recipe calls for overnight soaking and next-day grinding with onion, garlic, hot red peppers, parsley or cilantro. Then cumin, salt, pepper and baking powder are added. Before the falafel balls are fried, baking soda is added to help the falafel expand.

In The Book of New Israeli Food, Janna Gur writes that "falafel is synonymous with Israeli cuisine and Israel in general," and is made from fava beans or chickpeas. Her recipe uses ground chickpeas, onion, garlic, parsley, coriander and small hot green pickled peppers. This mixture is seasoned with cumin, cardamom, salt and pepper. She dissolves baking soda in water and adds it to the batter as well before moistening the falafel tool or ice cream scoop to make balls to fry in hot oil.

Joan Nathan, in The Foods of Israel Today, calls falafel "the ultimate Israeli street food" and says its name could have come from the word, pilpel, for pepper. Egyptians made it with crushed fava beans or fava beans combined with chickpeas and bulgur, Nathan says.

Marlena Spieler calls falafel the "classic Israeli snack food" in her book, Jewish Cooking. She maintains that "the secret to good falafel is using well-soaked but not cooked chickpeas, and not canned chickpeas. Her recipe includes chickpeas, bulgur wheat, onion, garlic, parsley, fresh and ground coriander, baking powder, salt, pepper, cayenne pepper, curry powder and whole wheat flour.

Avi Ganor and Ron Maiberg call falafel "the king [of street food] by popular consent" in Taste of Israel. They say when Israel was a newly created state, Israelis took it as their national food and it was "judged by its texture and taste, by the way the crushed chickpeas yielded to the teeth, by whether it was mild and restrained – the tamed Ashkenazi variety, or hot and spicy – the genuine Sephardi kind."

They claim today it is about quantity not quality and should be served by the vendor himself not taken by the customers like a salad bar.

> Falafel, schwarma and hummus are Israel's perfect street foods

Their version also starts with overnight soaked chickpeas. The next day includes baking soda, salt, cumin, coriander, onion, parsley, garlic, black pepper, lemon juice and chili pepper.

Ruth Sirkis, the "Julia Child" of Israel, calls falafel "a Middle Eastern specialty the Israelis have adopted wholeheartedly" in her book A Taste of Tradition. Her recipes calls for garbanzo beans, bulgur, dry wheat bread, garlic, parsley, lemon juice, cumin, coriander, salt, pepper, optional hot red pepper, eggs and bread crumbs.

In The Classic Mediterranean Cookbook by Sarah Woodward, Israel scores again. She calls falafel or chickpea fritters "the favourite street food of Israel" and makes them with the overnight soaked chickpeas that the next day are drained and ground with red onion, garlic, coriander, cumin, cayenne, salt, baking powder, with parsley or cilantro added before forming into patties and frying in oil.

In a very old classic cookbook of Israel, Israeli Cookery by Lilian Cornfeld, published in 1962, Cornfeld writes that falafel is high in calories because of the fat, but chickpeas are high in minerals, and rich in vegetable protein and vitamin B.

Schwarma

In The Book of New Israeli Food, Gur writes that schwarma comes from the Turkish word cevirme, meaning "rotating," and is also known as doner kebab. Traditionally, schwarma is made from lamb, but in Israel, it is made from turkey with lamb fat.

Schwarma is generally slivered off the rotisserie and placed in pita with hummus, techinah, french fries, salad and pickles.

Roden in A Book of Middle Eastern Food also describes doner kebab as a favourite in Turkey, where marinated lamb is threaded and packed with fat squeezed between on a rotating vertical spit that turns automatically over a hot charcoal fire.

In The Foods of Israel Today, Nathan says schwarma, the fast food meat of Israel, is a dish brought by the Turks to Israel. She says the word schwarma means "grilled" in Turkish. Originally the lamb or turkey was marinated overnight, then wrapped in layers around a rotisserie or large spit, covered with mutton fat and roasted on the spit. The cooked slices were then shaved off and served in pita with salads.

Hummus

"Israelis hold hummus in such high regard that it is rarely made at home. Instead it is savoured – or rather worshipped – at a favourite hummusia," Gur writes in The Book of New Israeli Food.

In the book, the basics are overnight soaked chickpeas with baking soda added; next day the tahini, lemon juice, crushed garlic and salt are added.

One can also add cumin, chopped hot red pepper, garlic and small hot green pickled peppers. Hummus is spooned onto a plate, tahini is placed in the centre with sauce on top of that, and olive oil and chopped parsley are added as a garnish.

Nathan shares her recipe in The Foods of Israel Today, suggesting overnight soaking of chickpeas followed by next-day cooking, draining and processing with techinah, lemon juice, garlic, salt, pepper, cumin and reserved cooking liquid. She garnishes the hummus with olive oil, some chickpeas, browned pine nuts, paprika or sumac, parsley or cilantro.

Spieler writes in Jewish Cooking that hummus is a classic Middle Eastern dish, and she offers a recipe with chickpeas, tahini, garlic, lemon juice, cayenne pepper, cumin, salt and pepper.

In Taste of Israel, Ganor and Maiberg agree that hummus is one of Israel's national foods because it is "filling, nutritious and cheap" and requires no forks and knives, just "pita bread and an expert wrist." Their version includes the overnight soaked chickpeas with baking soda, followed by a next-day cooking, then a mashing with some of the cooking liquid and garlic, salt, cumin, tahini and lemon juice.

"A skilled hummus artist can make a perfect crater with a thin film of paste in the middle in one swift, circular movement," they write. Then olive oil and some chickpeas are placed in the well.

Ansky writes in The Food of Israel that "everybody makes hummus in Israel." She says it should be made by hand using a mortar or grinder to mash the cooked chickpeas. She cooks hers with onions and garlic, then removes them before adding techinah, garlic, lemon juice and cooking liquid. She tops her version with warm chickpeas, chopped garlic, chopped green pepper and parsley, then pours olive oil on top.

In her book A Taste of Tradition, Sirkis calls hummus "a piquant appetizer, introduced to the nation by Middle Easterners." She uses soaked overnight garbanzo beans that are cooked the next-day and then ground with lemon juice, garlic, salt, pepper, tahini and olive oil added. She garnishes with olive oil, parsley, sweet paprika, olives and pickles.

In The Book of Jewish Food, Roden says that like falafel, hummus is "ubiquitous in Israel, and indeed all over the western world." She soaks the chickpeas overnight; the next day, she boils them with salt, then drains and blends them with cooking water, lemon juice, garlic, tahini and oil. She says some people add cumin to the tahini, and for a Yemenite version, garnish with hot red pepper or zhoug (Yemenite chili relish).

Iran, Zimbabwe make uranium deal, report says

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

JERUSALEM — Iran's foreign minister met the head of the United Nations' nuclear agency on Sunday to discuss a nuclear fuel swap proposal that could help ease Tehran's dispute with the West, Iranian officials and media said.

Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki told Iranian state television before his meeting with Yukiya Amano of the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) that their talks would be "decisive and detailed."

Iranian officials in the Vienna delegation confirmed to Reuters that the two men had met, but they gave no more information.

"The IAEA… can play a more constructive role," Mottaki said in his earlier comments. "We believe the fuel swap can create multilateral trust."

The meeting came just hours after the Sunday Telegraph reported that Iran had signed a secret deal with Zimbabwe to mine its untapped uranium reserves.

The agreement was secured last month, when a close aide to Zimbabwean President Robert Mugabe visited Tehran.

According to the deal, Iran will supply Zimbabwe oil in exchange for access to potentially huge deposits of uranium ore – which can be converted into basic fuel for nuclear power, or could also be enriched to make nuclear arms.

A Zimbabwean government source has told the Daily Telegraph that "Iran secured the exclusive uranium rights last month when minister of state for presidential affairs, Didymus Mutasa, visited Tehran. This is when the formal signing of the deal was made, away from the glare of the media."

The Daily Telegraph also reported that Iran's stockpiles of uranium, which mostly came from South Africa during the 1970s, has been running low, therefore the apparent deal with Zimbabwe has come at a critical time.

The Zimbabwean government source added that "the uranium deal is the culmination of a lot of work dating back to 2007, when Mugabe visited Tehran in search of fuel. Now Iran is beginning to reap the benefits.

"Iranian geologists have been conducting feasibility studies of the mineral for over a year now, and we expect them to go ahead with mining once they are ready."

Iran's nuclear ambitions continue to draw concerns from the United States and European allies who fear Iran is seeking the capability to build nuclear weapons. Iran has rebuffed diplomatic overtures to resolve the issue and is in defiance of UN Security Council demands that it suspend uranium enrichment.

In related developments, Iran's Revolutionary Guards test-fired five missiles on Sunday during war games in a waterway crucial for global oil supplies, the semi-official Iranian Fars News Agency reported.

The Islamic state, locked in a dispute with the West over its nuclear work, often announces advances in its military capabilities and tests weaponry in an apparent bid to show its readiness for any attack by Israel or the United States.

The Guards' exercises in the Gulf and the Strait of Hormuz coincided with rising tension between Iran and the West, which says Tehran's nuclear program is aimed at developing bombs.

Iran denies the charge.

Last week, the Pentagon said U.S. military action against Iran remained an option even as Washington pursues diplomacy and sanctions to halt the country's atomic activities.

Fars said naval units of the Guards fired five missiles at a target, without making clear if they were new.

"Despite the different places from which the missiles were fired, they all hit the target simultaneously and completely destroyed it," Fars reported.

The missiles were surface-to-surface and surface-to-sea.

Last Thursday, Iranian media said the Guards successfully tested a new speedboat capable of destroying enemy ships.

The United States is pushing for a fourth round of United Nations sanctions on Tehran over its refusal to halt sensitive nuclear activities as demanded by the UN Security Council, including proposed moves against members of the Guards.

Israel, widely believed to have the Middle East's only atomic arsenal, has described Iran's nuclear program as a threat to its existence and has not ruled out military action.

Iran, a predominantly Shiite Muslim state, has said it would respond to any attack by targeting U.S. interests in the region and Israel, as well as closing the Strait of Hormuz. About 40 per cent of the world's traded oil leaves the Gulf region through the strategic narrows.

Hamas derides Schalit in animated video

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

JERUSALEM — Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu hit out at Hamas on Sunday after the terror group released an animated short film depicting abducted Israel Defence Forces soldier Gilad Schalit, who has been held captive by Hamas in Gaza for nearly four years, returning to Israel in a coffin.

The video, said Netanyahu, is a reflection of "the true character of Hamas."

"It is yet another despicable action aimed to help the Hamas leadership avoid making a decision regarding our offer for a prisoner swap deal, which it has not responded to for many months," Netanyahu added.

"This offer, which was formulated between Israel and the Hamas with the German mediator, will enable a healthy and whole Gilad Schalit to return home to his family," Netanyahu said.

The three-minute video, shown on the website of Hamas' military wing, warns that Schalit could face the same fate as Israeli Air Force navigator Ron Arad, whose whereabouts have been unknown since he bailed out of his plane over Lebanon in 1986.

The voice-over in the clip is that of Schalit, as heard in a video released by his captors last September.

In the cartoon, the soldier's father, Noam Schalit, is seen walking aimlessly before picking up a newspaper with a front-page advertisement offering a reward of $50 million for information on his son.

The advertisement is a reference to Israel's offer of a $10-million reward for information about Arad.

Schalit was abducted on June 25, 2006, in a cross-border raid launched from the Gaza Strip by Palestinian militants. Hamas is demanding that Israel free 1,000 prisoners in exchange for him, but negotiations, held via a German mediator, have so far brought no result.

Hamas said it wanted to reach "the wide Israeli public" and end the months-long stalemate in German- and Egyptian-mediated talks on a prisoner swap.

"Our message is clear, and that is that Schalit's case must end with the release of our prisoners. Otherwise, he may end up like the missing Ron Arad," a Hamas source said, referring to an Israeli airman widely presumed to have died in captivity after he bailed out over Lebanon in 1986 and was seized by guerrillas.

"If the Israelis want Schalit to get released safe and sound, their government should pay the price by releasing Palestinian prisoners," Hamas declared.

"If the Israeli government rejects the Palestinian resistance demands, Israel will be obliged to release the Palestinian prisoners sooner or later with heavier prices… the prisoners will be released anyway," Hamas said.

Noam Schalit responded to the video shortly after it was issued, saying, "It is unfortunate that Hamas leaders choose, time and again, to use tactics of psychological warfare against the Schalit family and the Israeli public instead of referring to and approving a deal for the exchange of Palestinian prisoners that was handed to them by the German mediator and has been lying on their desk, unanswered, for four months."

He also referred to the letter he recently sent to Hamas politburo chief Khaled Meshal.

"As we stressed in the letter… the Hamas leaders express their political and personal interests over the interests of the Palestinian people by postponing the release of over 1,000 Palestinian prisoners, and the release of the entire population in the Gaza Strip from the continuous political and economic suffocation which they have been held in for years as a direct result of holding our son, Gilad, captive for over four years.

"The Hamas leaders would do well if they stopped producing films and… and took care of the real interests of the Palestinian prisoners and the simple Gaza residents, who have been held hostage by their own leaders for a long time," he added.

The cartoon displayed Sunday also warned that Hamas would kidnap more Israeli soldiers in order to bargain for the release of thousands of Palestinian prisoners held in Israeli jails.

Berkeley divestment effort fails

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Seeking to stage a conference that would bring some balance to discussions of the Arab-Israeli conflict, Prof. Hanan Alexander was a little taken aback by a remark from an academic colleague at the University of California at Berkeley.

The professor, Malcolm Feeley, "said it was the first time since 1983 that an event took place that looked at Israel in a balanced light," said Alexander. "One would have hoped you'd get a balanced perspective."

Hanan Alexander

Alexander, a visiting professor from the University of Haifa, titled the conference "Israel as a Jewish and Democratic State: Challenges and Perspectives." The event was co-sponsored by Feeley and Prof. Calvin Morrill.

It took place April 13, around the time the campus' student senate (ASUC) was meeting to consider overturning a veto by student president Will Smelko that had nullified a senate vote calling on the university to divest from General Electric and United Technologies, two U.S. companies that supply Israel's military.

The ASUC had approved the divestment bill, even though the university has no stake in the two companies

Alexander, a specialist in Jewish education, said the student bill had no practical significance "This is a struggle for the symbolism at the U of C at Berkeley," he said. "The leaders of this have a particular agenda, that they hold Israel as the problem in the Middle East conflict, and if that changes, it would end the conflict."

Alexander, who teaches courses on Israeli civics and Jewish identity, said proponents of divestment are engaged in "magical thinking" that includes "anti-Semitic rhetoric."

Berkeley is a centre of Marxist, neo-Marxist and post-colonial studies, and those theories "offer a simplistic view of the Palestinians as powerless and the Israelis with all the power," he said.

Instead, "this is an intractable political conflict" – not one of victims and victors – and the Palestinians are actors who have made decisions and reaped the results.

By believing "only Jews can solve the problem" and "holding Israel to blame and the Palestinians blameless" the theories reprise the view that Jews are all-powerful, similar to the Protocols of the Elders of Zion, he said.

Meanwhile, debate over the divestment resolution has made many Jewish students feel marginalized and uncomfortable. Students at the campus Hillel "felt personally attacked," Alexander said.

Last week, in the latest development on the divestment bill, the ASUC met to discuss ways of overriding the president's veto. The Daily Californian Online reported that the senators failed to come to a consensus on overriding the veto, leaving it in place. However, reports indicate pro-bill senators are considering various parliamentary procedures to revisit it.

Earlier, an attempt to overturn the veto failed after a 12-7-1 vote fell short of the two-thirds majority needed to negate it. The bill, titled "A Bill in Support of UC Divestment from War Crimes" attracted international attention and was supported by Nobel laureate Archbishop Desmond Tutu and Toronto author Naomi Klein, according to YNet News. Other supporters included activist Daniel Boyarin, a Jewish history researcher, and Ofra Ben-Artzi, Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's sister-in-law.

Among the bill's opponents are Nobel laureate Elie Wiesel, Harvard University law professor Alan Dershowitz and Israeli authors Amos Oz and A.B. Yehoshua.

Jweekly.com reported that in advance of the override meeting, Berkeley Hillel briefed student senators about the Israel-Palestinian conflict. Lobbying to maintain the veto, Hillel presented a letter to senators signed by 40 rabbis from the San Francisco area, local philanthropist Richard Goldman and Jewish organizations such as AIPAC, the Anti-Defamation League and the local Jewish Community Relations Council.

Netanyahu: Israel and U.S. want peace process to begin

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

JERUSALEM — It will soon become clear whether Middle East peace talks, suspended since December 2008, will resume, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said when he briefed his cabinet on his recent talks with U.S. Mideast envoy George Mitchell.

Addressing the weekly cabinet meeting, Netanyahu said Israel and the United States want to "begin a peace process immediately," adding that he hopes the Palestinians share the same goal.

"We will know in the coming days whether the process will get under way. I hope that it will indeed get under way," he said in public remarks at the cabinet session.

In a statement summing up his visit, Mitchell said he held "positive and productive talks" with Israeli and Palestinian leaders in an effort "to improve the atmosphere for peace and for proceeding with proximity talks," a reference to indirect U.S.-mediated negotiations.

Mitchell is expected back in the region next week.

Netanyahu has given no ground publicly over U.S. and Palestinian calls to halt the construction of settlements in eastern Jerusalem, an issue that has driven a wedge between Israel and the United States.

The Palestinians, who want east Jerusalem as the capital of a future state in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, have demanded a settlement freeze as a condition for peace talks.

Mitchell said in the statement that his deputy, David Hale, would remain behind to work with the parties this week to prepare for his return to the region next week.

On Saturday, Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas urged U.S. President Barack Obama to impose a solution to the Middle East conflict that would give the Palestinians an independent state.

Abbas' appeal to Obama came amid widespread media reports that the U.S. president was considering floating a proposal that would set the contours of a final peace deal.

Any such move would likely be opposed by Israel, which says a final settlement to the conflict can only be secured through negotiation.

Aides to Abbas raised the possibility that he would meet Obama in Washington next month, but said no invitation has been issued yet.

On Saturday, officials involved in efforts to renew peace talks said that indirect talks between Israel and the Palestinians will start no later than mid-May.

European officials who have met in recent days with senior officials at the White House and the State Department got the impression that the Obama administration did not expect the indirect talks to produce any agreement.

Efforts to push the peace process forward are meant to allow the United States to claim some success in its Mideast policy as the region marks one year since Obama's historic address in Cairo.

Officials in Washington say the talks with the Palestinians will force Netanyahu to reveal his positions beyond those outlined in his speech at Bar-Ilan University last June.

The Americans say that if Netanyahu takes an uncompromising stance in the negotiations like the one he displays in public, the Labor party might quit the coalition and pave the way for a new government.

PM rejects building freeze

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu has rejected an Obama administration call for a total construction freeze in eastern Jerusalem, the Wall Street Journal reported. The Prime Minister's Office confirmed the Journal report. Netanyahu did agree, however, to undertake confidence-building measures toward the Palestinians, according to the newspaper. They include allowing the opening of Palestinian Authority institutions in eastern Jerusalem, turning over more West Bank land to Palestinian security control and discussing core issues such as permanent borders and the status of Jerusalem during indirect peace talks instead of waiting for direct negotiations. The newspaper reported that U.S. officials said the refusal to freeze construction in all of eastern Jerusalem could be a barrier to starting new talks with the Palestinians, and that some of the concessions offered by Israel are "nearly identical" to a list that Israel has offered to the White House twice before in recent months but has not implemented.

Ben Gurion signs missing in Paris

Israeli media reported that signs marking the newly inaugurated Ben Gurion esplanade in Paris have disappeared. The city filed a complaint with police after the signs were noticed missing. Pro-Palestinian protesters and representatives of France's Communist Party led an active campaign to prevent Paris Mayor Bertrand Delanoe from honouring Israel's founding prime minister. Despite street protests, Delanoe went through with the renaming of the central Paris square on April 15, in the presence of Israeli President Shimon Peres. On the margins of the event, protests called Delanoe an "accomplice" to "Israeli assassins." No one has claimed responsibility for the apparent theft, according to French reports. The French Jewish umbrella group CRIF said April 22 that it was "shocked" by news of the missing plaques. The absent plaques "come in a context of anti-Israeli hysteria," CRIF said, in reference to the campaign to stop the renaming of the Paris square.

Rockets fired at Eilat strike Jordan

Two Katyusha rockets reportedly fired at Eilat from Egypt's Sinai Peninsula landed in Jordan. One of the rockets scored a direct hit on an air-conditioning storage building in the Red Sea port of Aqaba. Some reports said the rockets were fired from Jordan. No group has claimed responsibility for the attack. Egyptian defence sources have denied that the rockets were fired from Sinai toward Eilat, according to Egyptian media reports. Eilat was last struck by a terrorist attack in January 2007, when a suicide bomber killed three people. Earlier this month, Israelis were ordered to leave the Sinai over intelligence information that terrorists planned to abduct an Israeli tourist into Gaza.

PA denies Abbas health woes

Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas is in good health, his spokesperson said after reports that he is seriously ill. The London-based Arabic daily Al-Quds Al-Arabi reported that Abbas has been admitted to a hospital in Amman, Jordan, six times over the past three months and that the hospital wing was closed each time. Palestinian officials have denied the report. Abbas, 75, reportedly has a heart condition. He was hospitalized last month in Amman after reportedly falling in either his home or his hotel room. Abbas has been PA president since 2005. His term has officially expired, but it was extended by the Palestine Liberation Organization as Abbas' Fatah party and Hamas try to reconcile. Abbas has no clear successor.

JNF helping '21st Century Zionism' effort

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

The Israeli desert is abloom.

In what's being hailed as an act of "21st century Zionism" by JNF (Jewish National Fund) Canada, three new farming communities are sprouting up in Israel's Negev thanks to an influx of pioneering families, many of whom include people previously relocated from the Gush Katif settlements in Gaza in 2006.

Since then, JNF and Keren Kayemet L'Israel (KKL) offices around the world have been providing monetary and infrastructure assistance for the new communities, temporarily titled Haluziot I, Haluziot IV and Shlomit.

Haluziot I and IV are located half a kilometre from each other in the Haluza Sands of the western Negev, about one kilometre from the Egyptian border, while Shlomit is situated just northwest of Haluziot IV.

Josh Cooper, executive director of JNF Toronto, and Joe Rabinovitch, executive vice-president of JNF Canada, spoke to The CJN last week about the project.

Housing units being built in the Haluziot communities

"The work KKL-JNF is doing [in these communities] includes land reclamation for agricultural purposes, residential plots and security roads," Cooper said. "People think that JNF is all about planting trees, but we helped build Israel, and to this day, 62 years later, we're still doing it from nothing – from a sand dune."

Rabinovitch said JNF hopes the communities will be fully completed and inhabited by 2017 and that close to 2,000 people will live in these areas by then.

He added that one of JNF's main priorities over the next decade is to bring in 200,000 people to the Negev to reclaim the land and populate the region.

For now, Haluziot I and IV are slated to have 450 residential plots, while Shlomit will have 500.

Currently, families working on the new communities live in nearby towns while awaiting completion of their new homes.

Rabinovitch said the bulk of the people clamouring to settle on and farm this land are "Orthodox Zionists" with an average family size of eight children.

According to JNF, Haluziot I currently has 105 residential plots completed, 400 acres of agricultural land set aside, four kilometres of security roads built and 12 acres of infrastructure for temporary housing set up.

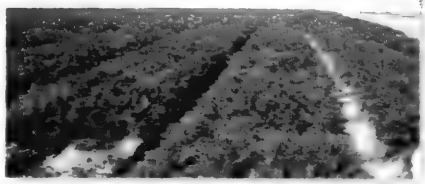
Haluziot IV is similarly prepared, while the Shlomit community housing project will start soon.

Cooper said the families are aware of the risks they'll face living just four kilometres from the Gaza border, well within range of Katyusha rockets.

During a visit to the region in February, Cooper and Rabinovitch said, they were "amazed" at the agricultural accomplishments already in evidence.

"There's sand everywhere, and then all of a sudden, organic green fields growing carrots, and greenhouses growing potatoes and tomatoes. I literally was able to pull carrots out of the sand and eat them in land that had [been barren] since the beginning of time," Cooper said.

But families aren't the only thing being relocated to these new settlements. In keeping with its longstanding tradition, JNF is also re-settling trees.



Reclaimed land on the Haluziot settlements

"When the settlers were removed from Gush Katif [by the Israeli government], one of the things the JNF undertook immediately was to go in with tractors and remove almost all the trees that were planted near the moshavs or homes," Rabinovitch said.

"These trees were stored [away] and they are now being replanted" in the new communities.

For its part, JNF Canada is contributing to a "general fund" for these communities and hopes to have a Canadian sponsor on board soon who will be able to provide funding "in the six-figure range," Rabinovitch said.

Anyone wishing to contribute to this project is encouraged to speak with their local JNF office.

Warsaw ghetto documentary will make you weep

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The Canadian International Documentary Festival, popularly known as Hot Docs, gets underway in Toronto on April 29 and runs until May 9.

A sampler:

Yael Hersonski's A Film Unfinished tears at one's heart and soul. This haunting documentary deconstructs the making of The Ghetto, a vile Nazi propaganda film that was never finished. Hersonski found it in a concrete vault, hidden in a forest in eastern Germany.

This historically significant film was made in the doomed Warsaw ghetto in May 1942, two months before most of its hungry, sick and bedraggled residents were deported to Treblinka. Hersonski describes it as a "rough first draft." It isn't clear why work on The Ghetto was cut short. The images, some of which flicker and melt, are searing. They were recorded by Willy Wist, who was forced by the SS to stage many of the scenes.

Adam Czerniakow, the head of the Judenrat, sits behind a desk in his office holding court. Diners in a restaurant enjoy a sumptuous meal while their fellow Jews outside starve to death. Talmud Torah students pore over texts. An infant is circumcised. An elaborate funeral procession wends its way down a road. Men and women at a fancy ball sip champagne and dance to music. A shopper enters a well-stocked grocery. And in a scene designed to humiliate and demean Jews, nude women step into a ritual bath full of naked men.

This chilling film brims with crowd scenes, underscoring beggars with sunken cheeks in rags and "prosperous" city dwellers in fine clothes on a stroll. There are also shots of horse-drawn carts and trams. As well, Wist's camera pans on corpses splayed on streets.

When he is interviewed, Wist claims he did not know a thing about the Holocaust. He complains that lighting conditions in the mikvah were poor. Former residents of the ghetto recall its misery and recognize some faces. We hear anguished excerpts from Czerniakow's diary and clinical voiceovers from a German commander in the ghetto.

Watch and weep.

May 2 at 1 p.m. at the Cumberland 3 Cinema and May 5 at 7 p.m. at the Cumberland 2 Cinema.

American academic/ lecturer Norman Finkelstein is a fierce critic of Israel who claims that the Holocaust has been exploited for partisan political ends. He is the subject of American Radical: The Trials of Norman Finkelstein, a balanced film by David Ridgen and Nicolas Rossier.

Norman Finkelstein is the subject of American Radical.

The son of Polish Jews who survived the rigours of the Warsaw ghetto, he has been fixated on Israel since the 1982 war in Lebanon. It was then that he held aloft a sign in front of the Israeli consulate in Manhattan comparing Israel to Nazi Germany. Since then, Finkelstein has claimed that Israel uses the Holocaust to deflect attention away from its "crimes" against the Palestinians. He also thinks that "Holocaust hucksters" foment anti-Semitism in Europe.

In this intriguing documentary, Finkelstein comes off as a possessed, cocksure, lonely figure whose animus for Israel is boundless and whose acidic views cost him jobs at two universities. The filmmakers interview him in New York City, his hometown, and trail after him in a speaking tour of U.S. and Canadian campuses.

In addition, Finkelstein is seen debating celebrity lawyer Alan Dershowitz, who has scathing opinions about him. Says Dershowitz, "If he was not Jewish, no one would have any doubt that he's an anti-Semite."

These are strong words, but Finkelstein is to blame for his isolation. Friends describe him as a self-destructive and needlessly provocative person who has singled out Israel. Even his mother, a pacifist, laments that her son has managed to destroy himself.

Finkelstein says that Jews have a right to self-determination in Israel. "I have no interest in bashing Israel," he claims disingenuously. But on a tour of Lebanon, he cozies up to Hezbollah, an Islamic organization that rejects Israel's existence, and calls its bombardment of Israel in 2006 "a very good thing."

May 6 at 9 p.m. at the Bloor Cinema and May 9 at 11:30 a.m. at the Isabel Bader Theatre.

Budrus, by Julia Bacha, is about a Palestinian Arab village near the Israeli border whose olive groves and farmlands are expropriated by the construction of Israel's security barrier. The residents of this scenic village in the West Bank rise up in nonviolent protest, joined by Israeli and foreign sympathizers.

They argue that the fence should be built along Israel's border rather than in Palestinian territory. In the interests of balance, Bacha interviews an Israeli army officer. He explains that suicide bombings made it necessary to build the fence. A female member of the Border Police who confronts demonstrators in the village is given air time, too.

If nothing else, this quietly powerful film exposes the tragedy of Israel's conflict with the Palestinians.

May 2 at 4 p.m. at the Isabel Bader Theatre and May 3 at 7:15 at the Royal Ontario Museum.

The aftermath of Israel's invasion of the Gaza Strip in January 2009 is the subject of Nicolas Wadimoff's Aisheen (Still Alive in Gaza).

Always underdeveloped and impoverished, Gaza is presented as a desolate and bleak place of broken buildings and mounds of rubble. Life goes on, yet nothing is normal. Palestinians queue for basic provisions. A boy who was wounded during the war vows to become a "martyr." Animals in a zoo go hungry. Israeli jets roar high in the sky. Clowns readying themselves for a children's party dress up as an explosion rocks the area. Aisheen depicts a people under siege and in distress.

May 3 at 9:30 p.m. at the Isabel Bader Theatre and May 6 at 1:30 p.m. at the Royal Ontario Museum.

Tahani Rached's Beirut! Not Enough Death To Go Around is a cri de coeur, a vivid portrait of Muslims in western Beirut who have endured hardships since the 1975 Lebanese civil war and the 1982 Israeli invasion of Lebanon. These working-class people express anger and disdain toward sectarian-minded Lebanese politicians, fear of Israel and sympathy for the Palestinians who live in their midst.

May 8 at 7:15 p.m. at Innis Town Hall.

Humour has evolved, cartoonist says

By SHERRY SMITHER
Special to The CJN

Cartoonist and editor Bob Mankoff loves to make people laugh. In the last 30 years, he's created more than 900 cartoons for the New Yorker magazine.

"Cartoonists take things that are mildly annoying, incongruous, but not so bad, and make fun of them in a good-natured way," Mankoff said in an interview at the Royal Ontario Museum.

"In cartooning humour, it's everything that's wrong but not tragic."

During his first trip to Toronto earlier this month, Mankoff gave a light-hearted talk for The Institute for Contemporary Culture at at the ROM on the "Ethos and Ethics of the New Yorker Cartoons." The event complemented the exhibit "Dan Perjovschi: Late News," an installation of cartoons, drawn directly onto the ROM's Roloff Beny Gallery walls, that runs until Aug. 15.

"And remember, if you need anything I'm available 24/6."

The New Yorker Magazine

Mankoff often looks at ordinary, everyday occurrences for inspiration.

"Let's say while coming into Toronto, I'm waiting forever for a grilled cheese sandwich. I'm thinking, in New York I'd be getting it already. It's an empty restaurant, why is it taking so long? Are they interrogating the sandwich? What's going on here? And so it's fun to look at that," said the artist, who's been drawing since he was eight years old. "Tensions and frictions of life won't get you down, if you step back."

Perhaps the New Yorker cartoon editor might be inspired by the ROM's architectural structure. "They let someone build this? It looks like a spaceship dropped on these other buildings and ate them," he said jokingly.

"I actually think the building is sort of interesting – I think it's both weird and interesting. It's both good and bad, and in that space of ambiguities is where you get jokes from both sides. If you really cared too much, if you really hated the building, you couldn't make jokes about it – you'd be incensed and be out there picketing!"

People's taste in humour differs, he said. "The easiest things to get laughs are aggressive, shocking or sexual things. That's probably what humour was originally for – dealing with these taboo things like trickster figures and myths. Like everything else, humour has evolved, so it's the evolved forms that interest me," Mankoff said.

For some, bloopers are humorous, and they tune into television shows like America's Funniest Videos or search YouTube for a laugh.

Glengarry Glen Ross still relevant today

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

Actor and director Jordan Pettle, 38, is reprising the role of John Williamson in a remount of Soulpepper Theatre Company's production of David Mamet's Pulitzer Prize winning play Glengarry Glen Ross.

The critically acclaimed and sold-out production from last season is currently on at the Young Centre for the Performing Arts in the Distillery Historic District until June 5.

"The play is set in Chicago in 1983, in a real estate office," explains Pettle. "There is a sales contest going on as the play starts. Certain salesmen are worried about being axed from the company. It revolves around the manipulations and games that these guys do to make sales and screw each other around. It's a vicious, volatile, macho world."

Pettle says the play is also very funny—a dark comedy. He says Glengarry Glen Ross translates well in today's world because unfortunately people are as vicious and manipulative as ever in certain worlds, especially when it comes to men competing against each other in certain aspects of society, especially the business world.

"John Williamson is the office manager – the authority figure in the office. He is loathed by the salesman because he doesn't really have any practical experience in the field," Pettle says.

Pettle says Glengarry Glen Ross is a great story, very entertaining with a mystery involved. He wants audiences to have a good time and to recognize themselves on some level, because he feels that is always the purpose of theatre.

"I am thrilled it is being remounted, it is one of the best experiences I have had working on a play," Pettle says. "I love David Mamet, I always wanted to do his stuff. I did some of it in theatre school and to get a chance to do it for Soulpepper, which is a fantastic theatre company and with this company of actors…I feel, very, very lucky."

Jordan Pettle, left, with Eric Peterson.

The show, directed by David Storch, returns with its original cast which includes veteran thespian, Eric Peterson, Shelley Levene, Soulpepper's artistic director Albert Schultz, Kevin Bundy, Peter Donaldson, Stephen Guy-McGrath and William Webster as George Aaranow.

Pettle says it has been heaven working with this cast. "I get to do a lot with Eric Peterson. I worked with Eric before in Picasso at the Lapin Agile for CanStage in 2001. I am a huge fan, it is a joy to work with him."

Pettle is no stranger to the Soulpepper stage. His list of credits include Travesties, Glengarry Glen Ross and Waiting for Godot. He's also appeared in TV and films.

Married to actress Shannon Perreault, who is currently in If We Were Birds at the Tarragon Theatre until May 23, the two are the parents of 8-month-old son Samuel. They will soon be heading to New York, where they will be performing in Ritter, Dene, Voss – an Austrian play by Thomas Bernhard.

Perreault originated her role for that play in the Toronto production for One Little Goat, and both performed the show in Chicago.

When Pettle isn't onstage or looking after Sammy, he enjoys playing softball and poker and loves going to restaurants.

Tickets are available by calling the Young Centre box office at 416-866-8666 or by visiting www.soulpepper.ca.

A special brand of humour

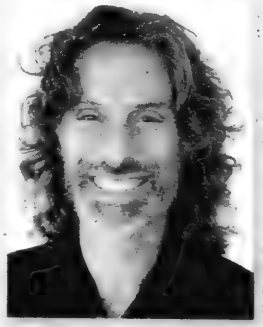
But New Yorker cartoons have a special brand of humour – they make you think, he said.

"Whatever people like is fine. I really don't make any apologies. I'm sort of an elitist, because that's what I think the New Yorker is, [although] it's not elitist, it's not intentionally trying to carve out something for itself to be better. It actually has its own standards," he explained.

When Mankoff's not producing cartoons for the New Yorker and Moment magazine – an American Jewish publication – he also runs their cartoon caption contests. And he teaches a course in Humour: History, Theory and Practice at the University of Michigan, which examines humour through the ages.



Robert Mankoff

Mankoff often speaks to groups about Jewish humour and its influence on culture. "Just look at vaudeville, the immigrant experience and comedy writers – lots of Jews – including me. And Jewish jokes are distinct. They tend not to be sexual or scatological or aggressive, and there's usually a logical flip in them that makes them funny."

He illustrates: "When the matchmaker makes a match and the groom sees his prospective bride, he whispers to the matchmaker: 'She's got a limp, she's 100 pounds, she's bald and she's blind in one eye.' And the matchmaker replies, 'You don't have to whisper, she's also deaf!' "

Group show features Israeli artists of Toronto

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

When Moshe Mikanovsky, an Israeli visual artist and software developer, picked up a flyer advertising the art show of the Israeli Artists Group of Toronto last year, he says he was very surprised to discover that such an art group existed.

"I'd been living in Toronto for seven years, and I had never heard of this organization." The painter and printmaker, who is known for his ketubah and Judaic art as well as portraiture, says he attended the art show hoping to make a connection with other Israeli artists. "I didn't know what to expect," he recalls. "The artists were very welcoming when I came to that first show."

Indeed, not only did he forge new friendships but Mikanovsky, 38, has also become a spokesperson for the Israeli art group and a key promoter of the upcoming 2010 show.

The Israeli Artists Group of Toronto Second Annual Art Show coincides with Jerusalem Day, which is on May 12 this year. The show runs from May 13 to 16 at JEH Thoreau MacDonald House, located at 121 Centre St. in Thornhill. The opening takes place May 13 from 6 to 9 p.m.

The exhibition showcases the work of 23 artists. "The art is at a very high level," says Mikanovsky. "Many of the artists have had their work in juried shows and in other galleries. Myriam Levy and Bianka Guna show in galleries across the city. Irit Lepkin is known for her clay sculptures."

The multi-disciplinary exhibit offers a range of styles from representational to abstract, in a variety of media, he notes. "We have mixed media, oil, acrylic and water painting, sculpture, ceramics, some jewellery and one photographer."

He adds that the subjects portrayed include both Judaic and non-Judaic themes.

Mikanovsky notes that the artists, whom he describes as a diverse group of people, provide a support network to one another throughout the year. Monthly meetings offer social and educational opportunities for the group. "We go to art galleries together. We bring in speakers. We help each other find new marketing opportunities."

Mikanovsky says he received his training in software developing when he was in the army, but he has had a long-standing interest in art. "I always dreamt of being an artist."

The Bnei Brak native studied at the Avni Institute of Art and Design in Tel Aviv, and he's taken many art courses over the years. Last year, he was commissioned by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto to create two tribute cards for Rosh Hashanah, and this year he designed a Pesach card for the organization.

Mikanovsky runs a blog for his art colleagues at Israeliartistsgroup.com/blog. "My main goal has been to give more exposure to the group."

Shaked Kaplan, 34, president of the Israeli Artists Group of Toronto, says the first group art exhibit last year — it showcased the work of 16 artists – inspired more people to participate this year. "It was a big success. It attracted a lot people and a lot of new members with good energy."

She says many of the original members – they started the group in 1992 – are still involved. Today, there are 35. Kaplan, who is originally from Kibbutz Magal, is the youngest.

She studied ceramics at Tel Hai Academic College in the north of Israel. Her training also included a component in education. She says she has had significant experience coaching children with a variety of learning and psycho-social challenges.

She came to Canada 3-1/2 years ago to work with a child who has ADD (attention deficit disorder). She calls the Israeli family who sponsored her "my adopted family."

Kaplan says she specializes in hand-building and creates functional objects such as lamps, tables and teapots. She also teaches ceramics at her studio in Richmond Hill, Ont. "I'm trying to build an art centre to bring in more artists."

She stresses that holding the Israeli Artists Group exhibition as close as possible to Jerusalem Day is a way of marking this national day. "We're an Israeli group."

"It was very important to us that the show would have a connection to Israel."

For more information about the upcoming show, call 416-525-1350 or visit the website at Israeliartistsgroup.com.

Yann Martel and a Post-Holocaust Tradition

By NORMAN RAVVIN
Special to The CJN

For a book that has already gained a great deal of attention for its weighty themes, Yann Martel's new novel, Beatrice & Virgil, is a quick read, easily finished in two or three sittings. It is built of discrete sections, a number of which include the scenes of a play. These, written by one of the novel's two main characters, make use of the epigrammatic language of children's stories. But Martel's intentions in this, his third novel, are undoubtedly grand.

Norman Ravvin

Beatrice & Virgil (Knopf Canada) aims to offer a philosophical response to the mistreatment of animals and to the meaning of the Holocaust, while examining the demands of making art about such difficult subjects. Autobiographical links inform key narrative threads, as Martel can be recognized as a model for Henry, the novel's successful writer who has gone incommunicado to evade his new-found fame.

If not for the Man Booker Prize, which was awarded to Martel's 2001 novel Life of Pi, Beatrice & Virgil would not attract great scrutiny. But the Booker catapulted Martel into the literary stratosphere, where follow-up efforts attract multi-million dollar advances and intense critical and popular attention. This latter phenomenon is exaggerated in Canada's small literary market, where our literary stars are sometimes lavished with a celebrity that swamps their actual effect on the page.

Beatrice & Virgil is foremost a book about animals, as was Life of Pi. Its two central human characters are less sensitively portrayed than the animal creatures on whom Martel's descriptive power alights. Here, one thinks of another beloved Canadian author, Timothy Findley, whose rural home was a menagerie of sorts, and whose provocative novel, Not Wanted on the Voyage, also linked the abuse of animals and the environment with the Holocaust. This aspect of Findley's novel gained little attention; rather, it was his burlesquing of traditional religion (Lucifer as a cheeky cross-dresser, God as a desiccated aristocrat) that gained him some surly readerly response.

The Holocaust themes in Beatrice & Virgil are more overt than they are in Findley's book. Martel's largely actionless plot ends with a splash of violence – graphic Gestapoesque torture and a cinematic pogrom visited on two mothers and their infants. But for much of the narrative, Martel's Henry pursues an enigmatic relationship with the proprietor of a taxidermy shop.

This taxidermist is writing a play about a howler monkey and a donkey – the Beatrice and Virgil of the novel's title – which employs a range of Holocaust motifs. We are meant to uncover them gradually, as does Henry, but the press about all this has preceded the novel, so we know we are reading a book "about the Holocaust" before Martel's goals become clear.

Gradually, the excerpts from the taxidermist's play build toward an allegorical response to the Holocaust, which culminates, late in the novel, when Henry acknowledges that he "knew for certain what the taxidermist was doing. . . . he was using the Holocaust to speak of the extermination of animal life. . . . He was seeing the tragic fate of animals through the tragic fate of Jews. The Holocaust as allegory."

Through much of Beatrice & Virgil it would seem that this is Martel's goal (certainly it is the main effect of much of the narrative). Yet, by the novel's end, readers may not be entirely clear on what Martel's goals have been. The taxidermist turns out to be someone other than Henry took him to be, so the status of his play is up for grabs.

Certainly, the challenge of making a tricky, writerly book about the events of the war, and forcing its readers to look for clues and encounter surprising associations, are among the novel's motivations. But only readers with a great deal of knowledge about Holocaust history and art will catch the ins and outs of Martel's coded approach to his subject (the street address where part of Emmanuel Ringelblum's Warsaw Ghetto archive was unearthed is raised, but the uninitiated will have to do further research to engage with this remarkable historical site).

In fact, it is children's books about the war that often make use of a similar strategy, in an effort to both reveal and hide aspects of the wartime disaster beneath a palatable surface of word and image. This strategy, in books like The Boy in the Striped Pajamas, is also found in films such as Roberto Benigni's Life is Beautiful. Book designers at Knopf seem to have picked up on a cover detail employed for The Boy in the Striped Pajamas: for Beatrice & Virgil, the iconic stripes of a camp inmate's uniform are transformed on the hardback's cloth cover into the curved stripes of an animal's hide.

It is not clear how readers of Beatrice & Virgil should take the notion that one might better understand the experience of animals, doomed "creatures that could not speak for themselves," once they are "given the voice of a most articulate people who had been similarly doomed." Certainly, one of Martel's accomplishments – not necessarily one he consciously strove for – is a Holocaust-themed book with almost nothing Jewish in it. One strives for an analogy: a baseball game without the ball; or an architectural drawing sketched in plain air.

There is a skilled suppleness, almost a naiveté, in Martel's tone as he works at making this material weighty and wise. It may be that Beatrice & Virgil arrives at a time when Holocaust-related writing and art is shifting once more, based on a new generational and cultural context. Readers, the press and critics will make use of this literary season to grapple with such issues.

Norman Ravvin's essays on Jewish literature are collected in A House of Words: Jewish Writing, Identity and Memory. His forthcoming novel, from Gaspereau Press, is The Joyful Child. He is Chair of the Concordia Institute for Canadian Jewish Studies.

Thieves is a chilling picture of Russian Mafia

Alexander Gentelev's Thieves by Law is about the Russian Mafia, some of whose members have found a refuge in Israel. By his reckoning, these ruthless gangsters live by their own rules, go to any lengths to protect their honour and crave material goods, ranging from expensive oil paintings and top-of-the-line luggage to Mediterranean mansions.

According to Gentelev, they made their fortunes in the early 1990s when Russia, in its rush to a capitalist system, sold off state enterprises for bargain basement prices. Several of these high-living criminals, notably Grisha Lerner and Leonid Bilunov, have acquired Israeli citizenship and passports, which enable them to move around freely. Since Israel has no law to counter money laundering, they flock to the Jewish state like moths to light.

Thieves by Law is a chilling picture of an alternative universe.

May 5 at 9 p.m. at the Cumberland 3 Cinema and May 8 at 10 p.m. at the Isabel Bader Theatre.

Daddy's Girl, by Lily Sheffy, is an unusual Israeli film about a serial philanderer, as seen through the eyes of the filmmaker's caring daughter. Yaron Ivry, a physically fit consultant in his mid-50s, commutes regularly between Israel and Europe. But his trips are not solely for business. He keeps a mistress in Germany and has a pregnant second wife in Israel, all the while pursuing yet another German woman. "I do what most men want but dare not do," he says openly.

Although Sheffy, his daughter, disapproves of his behavior and morals, she has accompanied him on many dates and regards him as a confidant.

A Film Unfinished* tears at one's heart and soul.

Daddy's Girl is a morally complex film about desire, lust, companionship and, believe it or not, love.

May 2 at 9:30 p.m. at the Cumberland 2 Cinema and May 4 at 4 p.m. at the Royal Ontario Museum.

Goalie gets partial hockey scholarship to U.S. school

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

With their gold medal performances at the Olympics and in world competitions, you'd think Canada's women's hockey team would have created widespread interest in the sport among young women.

Not so at Ali Ponte's school.

Though Ali is a diehard fan and accomplished player, virtually none of her friends at Richmond Hill High School is interested in the sport. They're "girly" girls who don't much participate in any sport, said the 18-year-old junior goalie.

While she has trouble rustling up conversations about the playoffs among her friends – only one girlfriend is as interested in the NHL as she is – Ponte will continue to be immersed in hockey for years to come.

Ponte, a goalie with Markham-Stouffville Junior Stars of the Provincial Women's Hockey League (PWHL), earned a partial scholarship to tend the twine tent for the Plymouth State Panthers of the Eastern College Athletic Conference (ECAC), an NCAA division III affiliate. She'll head out to central New Hampshire in the fall, where she expects to earn a degree in environmental studies and play hockey for the next four years.

Ponte has been told by the Panthers' coach that she'll be the team's starter.

Ponte can expect to face a lot of pucks in Plymouth. The Panthers were 0-24 this year. Yikes!

Whether the calibre of player she'll face versus ECAC opponents will be better or worse than in Ontario remains to be seen. The Stars faced national-level players in the PWHL, the premier women's circuit in Ontario. Some of those players are moving on to NCAA Division I teams.

Prior to joining the Junior Stars, Ponte enjoyed some success at the midget level. She played last year with Scarborough Sharks Midget AA, which won the provincial AA championship and earning a silver medal at the Esso Cup, the national AAA midget tournament. They lost in the title game to the Westman Wildcats, a team from Winnipeg.

"We just played well as a team after losing the first couple of games badly," she said. "It was the last hurrah for the team, and we felt we should make the most of it."

As for her own performance, Ponte said "I made some nice saves. I bounced back after the first game when we lost badly."

Prior to that, she was on four consecutive GTHL boys championship teams.

This season was another story, however. The Stars were badly outmatched in the PWHL. They managed a rather woeful 5-24-5 record, which Ponte said is attributable to the fact the Stars were a brand new team and most of the players moved up from midget AA, "so we didn't have much experience."

"The teams in junior are a lot better," she added.

Nevertheless, Ponte was scouted for a college career and impressed with her butterfly style and perhaps her devilish attitude: "I like playing goal. I like stopping the other players and making them look bad. That kind of thing."

Perhaps the Plymouth coaches saw a video of her performance against the Chinese national team. Prior to the Vancouver Olympics, the Stars played Team China in a pre-tournament warm up and lost 6-4. Other women's teams with better league records didn't do nearly as well, she said.

Nevertheless, Ponte has no illusions about an international career. For her, hockey is a nice way to pay part of her tuition at Plymouth and help her attain her ultimate goal – to become a geologist.

Hockey and geology. I wonder what the girly girls at Richmond Hill will make of that.

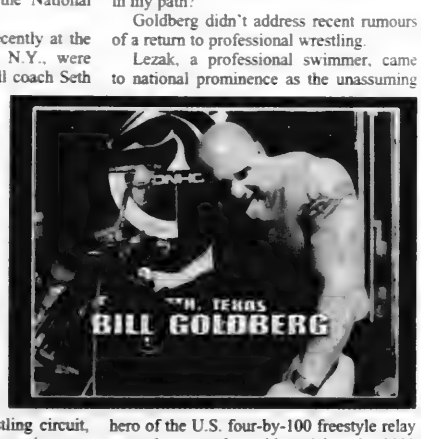
Lezak, Goldberg among inductees to Jewish Hall of Fame

JTA

NEW YORK — Pro wrestler Bill Goldberg and Olympic swimmer Jason Lezak were among seven inductees into the National Jewish Sports Hall of Fame.

The five others inducted recently at the Hall of Fame in Commack, N.Y., were Virginia Tech men's basketball coach Seth Greenberg; female judo champion Rusty Kanokogi; Penn State women's volleyball coach Russ Rose; Achilles Track Club founder Dick Traum; and former NFL offensive lineman Alan Veingrad.



Goldberg, an all-American defensive end at the University of Georgia, was taken in the 11th round of the 1990 NFL draft by the Los Angeles Rams, but he turned to wrestling and martial arts three years after an injury ended his football career in 1994. During his seven-year career on the World Champion Wrestling circuit, World Wrestling Entertainment twice recognized Goldberg as the world heavyweight champion.

In an often humorous and casually self-effacing speech at the Hall of Fame ceremony, Goldberg sought to tie his unconventional career choice in professional wrestling to Judaism.

"I wanted to try my best to give the Jewish youth something to look up to, someone who's persevered and somehow made a difference," Goldberg said.

"What better way to help Jewish youth in dealing with adversity than to parade around the ring on national television in my underwear, demolishing every single person in my path?"

Goldberg didn't address recent rumours of a return to professional wrestling.

Lezak, a professional swimmer, came to national prominence as the unassuming hero of the U.S. four-by-100 freestyle relay team that won the gold medal at the 2008 Beijing Olympics and set a world record. His dramatic final lap of the race made international headlines and helped teammate Michael Phelps notch a crucial victory on his way to a record eight gold medals at the Games.

Lezak has won numerous Olympic medals, including an individual bronze at the '08 Games, and he earned four gold medals at the Maccabiah Games in Israel last summer.

REMEMBERING OUR YESTERDAYS

By BILL GLADSTONE

THE NORTH Y, 50 YEARS AGO: The Bathurst Jewish Community Centre is shown 50 years ago in 1960, soon after it first opened. The site subsequently underwent immense growth with the addition of the Lipa Green Centre, Leah Posluns Theatre and Koffler Centre of the Arts. Today known as the Prosserman JCC, it is again in the midst of a massive redevelopment, with old buildings being demolished as new ones are raised. Meanwhile, the Miles Nadal JCC at Bloor and Spadina continues to thrive and a new JCC, the Schwartz/Reisman Centre, is being developed up north. [City of Toronto Archives photo]

Stooped over until when?

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

One day on the way to work, I saw an old man stooped over. He was walking by a homeless man who sat on the ground.

The old man's back was hunched. He stared at the ground, seeing just enough in front of him so as not to crash into somebody, trip over the homeless man.

How strange it must be to watch the ground while others see the horizon. How familiar with the pavement cracks he must be. How many times did he save his mother's back from being broken? He is hunched. He is bent.

That is what we're like sometimes – our community and our people. We're crooked and we're bent. Why must that be so?

Over the centuries, the weight of the pyramid stones, the 13th of Adar (the Fast of Esther), Haman, and the rocks and rubble we were forced to carry on our shoulders pushed us down and down, over and over again.

We couldn't stand erect?

But don't you know that the pyramids are already built and the Nazis lie dormant for now? And if you know that, and if you are aware of these facts, you can stand upright for now. Then why don't you?

Theodor Herzl died in 1904 at age 44, but only after he heard the people of France yelling, "Death to the Jews," and only after this secular journalist scoffed at the peasants and the pogroms and the Inquisitors. He listened and heard the pulsing vibrations of anti-Semitism and lifted his eyes and straightened his spine until he was as tall as he could be.

Somewhere in his Jewish soul and mind, he knew, like the biblical Jacob, how to defend his nation, his family. Jacob divided up the camp and sent his flocks ahead, his strategy while Esau headed toward him. He acted.

Herzl did, too. He did not sit quietly in make believe, or pretend that all was well. He planted the seeds that grew the State of Israel. He was not bent.

You are walking with eyes down, but nobody will save our people if we do not first save ourselves.

There is only one answer to all of this. Israel is mighty, but it was also so before the rise of the Assyrians, Romans, Babylonians, Greeks and Romans. A spine can only bend so much. Doesn't it seem as if the pressure on Israel is growing?

Diaspora Jewry is strong but small and defenceless, really, without Israel and friends. We act though as if it has always been this way, as if our people have always been in Congress, the Senate, Parliament and the Supreme Court; and heads of banks and schools.

But we forget there was a time a few short decades ago when we hid away on our knees – a Jew, a secret.

There is only one answer. We must fight to make friends. We must battle with our enemies. Each of us must create allies on our street, in our cities, in our countries – everywhere. This is a plan, like Jacob's, like Herzl's.

This is a plan. It must come from all of us. We are all leaders.

We must send flocks ahead and set tables for our friends to eat with us. We must be stocky, able to defend ourselves. This is a plan. Without one, we are stooping. How blind will we allow ourselves to get. How bent will our backs become?

How familiar will we be with the cracks?

Post copies of this around the house. Just reading it does nothing.

Knesset conversion bill draws warning

JTA

NEW YORK — The Conservative, Reform and Reconstructionist movements in North America are warning that a proposed Israeli conversion bill is "disastrous to the unity of the Jewish people."

Knesset members from the Yisrael Beiteinu party were in the United States last week trying to marshal support for a bill that would change the conversion process in Israel.

While the bill's proponents say it would make it easier for the estimated 350,000 to 400,000 non-Jewish Israelis from the Russian-speaking immigrant community to convert to Judaism and marry in Israel, critics say the bill threatens to alter the Law of Return and consolidate conversion power in the hands of the Chief Rabbinate.

That "could have devastating effects on the relationship between Israeli and Diaspora Jewry," the three main non-Orthodox Jewish movements in the United States said in a joint statement. "Such concentration of powers in favour of ultra-Orthodox Jewry effectively negates the roles of the non-Orthodox movements both within Israel and abroad, sending the message that only the Orthodox have a place within our homeland."

Conservative, Reform, Reconstructionist movements call it 'disastrous'

The statement said the legislation, which is being promoted by Knesset member David Rotem, would revive the destructive debate over who is a Jew and turn the clock back on 20 years of accomplishments in the Israeli Supreme Court asserting the legitimacy of non-Orthodox movements.

"The bill mentions no alternative method of conversion via non-Orthodox streams," the statement said. "We – and more importantly, our Israeli colleagues and their lawyers – believe that this language, if adopted as written, would further marginalize and hamper the Masorti and Reform movements in Israel. This would be a tragic consequence as we offer vibrant religious alternatives to a nation of Jews religiously alienated by the increasingly extreme positions of a minority religious establishment."

In an interview last week with JTA, Rotem said the non-Orthodox religious streams in the United States shouldn't be anxious about the bill.

"I want them not to worry it's going to harm them," Rotem said. "This law doesn't deal with conversions done abroad. We have to solve an internal Israeli problem."

Still uppermost in our minds

A group of Israelis last week attended a Kabbalat Shabbat service in honour of Gilad Schalit near the prime minister's residence in Jerusalem. Schalit was kidnapped by Hamas and has been held in Gaza since June 2006. Israelis and other concerned individuals are determined not to let the world forget about Schalit's captivity.

The News in Brief

Pro-Israel MP Quits

OTTAWA — NDP MP Judy Wasylycia-Leis, a prominent Israel advocate who has frequently criticized her own party's stands on the Jewish state, quit last week, saying she is "seriously contemplating" a run to unseat Sam Katz, Winnipeg's first Jewish mayor. The 58-year-old Winnipeg North MP, whose resignation was effective May 1, had held her riding since 1997 and previously served as a provincial cabinet minister under Howard Pawley from 1986 to 1988.

Book Wins Award

WINNIPEG — Allan Levine's book Coming of Age: A History of the Jews of Manitoba won the $5,000 McNally Robinson Manitoba Book of the Year Award April 25 at the 22nd annual Manitoba Book Awards in Winnipeg. In addition to winning the top prize, the book was nominated for three other awards in the competition.

Tourism Record Set

TORONTO — Travel to Israel from Canada reached an all-time high in March, with 5,906 Canadians arriving, the highest ever for that month and a 24 per cent increase over the same period last year, the Israel Government Tourist Office said. Also, 313,000 tourists from around the world arrived in March, a 56 per cent increase over the same period last year, and nine per cent more than the previous record set in March 2000. Travel to Israel saw a 54 per cent increase in the first quarter of 2010 overall, compared to the same period last year.

World

Goldstone To Be Feted

SAN FRANCISCO — Tikkun magazine will give its 25th annual ethics award next year to Richard Goldstone, author of the UN report on the Gaza war. The announcement came amid controversy over Goldstone's attendance at his grandson's bar mitzvah in South Africa. Goldstone initially said he would skip the simchah to avoid planned protests by Zionist groups in South Africa, but an agreement was reached to allow him to attend the bar mitzvah without protest. Goldstone, a respected jurist in South Africa, has been persona non grata in pro-Israel circles since the publication last year of his UN-sponsored report on the 2009 war that said both Israel and Hamas committed war crimes and possibly crimes against humanity. Israel denounced the report as biased and inaccurate. Tikkun's founder and editor, Rabbi Michael Lerner, said the decision was made prior to the bar mitzvah issue and that the timing of the announcement was the result of his "outrageous" treatment by fellow South African Jews.

Orthodox Groups Opposes Female Rabbis

NEW YORK — The leading modern Orthodox rabbinic association has adopted an official position against the ordination of women while also encouraging the creation of "halachically and communally appropriate professional opportunities" for female scholars.

Members of the Rabbinical Council of America adopted the resolution during their three-day conference last week in Scarsdale, N.Y. The resolution came just months after the near ordination of a female rabbi by one of the RCA's highest-profile members drew a sharp rebuke from the haredi Orthodox leadership of Agudath Israel of America.

The resolution cites "commitment to sacred continuity" in saying that the group "cannot accept either the ordination of women or the recognition of women as members of the Orthodox rabbinate, regardless of the title." But it stops short of sanctioning or expelling members who violate the policy, a move urged by some rabbis upset over the recent actions of RCA member Rabbi Avi Weiss.

Rabbi Weiss sparked outrage in January when he conferred the title of "rabba" – a feminized version of rabbi – on Sara Hurwitz, staff member at his New York synagogue, the Hebrew Institute of Riverdale. After the Agudah condemnation and talks with RCA officials, Rabbi Weiss said he didn't intend to confer the title on anyone else, saying Orthodox unity was of more pressing importance.

Google Buys Start-up

JERUSALEM — Google bought its first Israeli firm. Google said April 27 that it's buying privately backed start-up Labpixies, which develops personalized web gadgets for Google's personalized search page iGoogle and mobile devices. The $25-million deal is the first for Google in Israel since launching a research and development centre there in 2005. Labpixies' 10 staffers will be integrated into Google Israel's Tel Aviv office.

Koffler exhibit captures life in pre-Nazi Germany

By RANDI BERGMAN
Special to The CJN

Time is at a halt, if only for the next month, in the Kiever Synagogue.

The shul in Kensington Market is playing host to artist E.C. Woodley's "Auguststrasse 25."

Run in conjunction with the Koffler Centre for the Arts, the exhibit is the latest in the gallery's projected four-year run of travelling exhibits, as the Koffler Centre waits for renovations to be completed.

Woodley, a Toronto-based sound artist and composer, has built a makeshift shrine to pre-Nazi secular Jewish German life: a typical Berlin living room of the late 1920s, located at Auguststrasse 25.

The décor is unremarkable, yet it captures the normality of the everyday lives of prewar European Jews, who didn't realize what was to come. We can't help but shudder.

A round mahogany table is placed across from a lived-in-looking sofa. Contemporary German novels are scattered on a coffee table. Sourced from a variety of antique dealers and galleries in the city, all the furniture is authentically prewar.

According to several copies of the popular dailies Berliner Tageblatt and Neue Berliner-Zeitung, which are piled atop the writing desk, the year is 1928. The viewer knows that the Nazis are slowly but surely working their way into power – yet everything seems like life as usual in this modest but well-furnished middle-class living room.

A young woman in her mid-20s fiddles around in the room aimlessly – flipping through a 1920s-era German translation of Dante's The Divine Comedy for a few pages, and then shuffles off to the writing desk, where she writes a few lines to a far-off friend, or so we are allowed to guess. Played by actress Charlotte Corbeil-Coleman, the young woman, named Lottie by the artist, is a permanent fixture of the installation – meant at once to pull you in and draw you out.

"The idea is not to do theatre as if there were an end," says Woodley. "The performance continues for six hours per day, whether anyone is there to bear witness to it or not. The experience of viewing the piece changes with the shifting of the light during the hours of the day, and some of the most beautiful changes in light and in Lottie's specific presence may go unseen.

Remember Jerusalem

From the editor's desk...

It probably ranked as one of the most stunningly ignorant, deplorably disingenuous or pointedly provocative statements of modern time. Or, perhaps even all of them.

At the Camp David summit in the year 2000, Palestinian Authority leader Yasser Arafat is reported to have said to U.S. President Bill Clinton, "I am a religious man, and I will not allow it to be written of me [in history] that I have... confirmed the existence of the so-called temple underneath the mountain." The statement was reported in the London-based newspaper Al-Hayat Al-Jadida, Aug. 12, 2000. Some two years later, in an interview published in the same paper on Oct. 5, 2002, Arafat expanded upon his views of the existence of the Temple in Jerusalem.

"For 34 years, they [the Jews] have dug tunnels, the most dangerous of which is the great tunnel. They found not a single stone proving that the Temple of Solomon was there, because historically the Temple was not in Palestine [at all]. They found only remnants of a shrine of the Roman Herod." (The translations from Arabic are by the Middle East media research institute, MEMRI.)

Arafat's declaration, however, was not simply the result of a momentary intellectual infirmity or the temporary wiping clean of his historical chalkboard. It was, rather, one of a series of statements by Palestinian political, religious and academic leaders reflecting deeply held historical and theological beliefs.

For example, on Aug. 25, 2000, Arafat's eventual successor, Mahmoud Abbas, was quoted saying much the same thing.

Sheikh Ikrima Sabri, the former mufti of Jerusalem was even more strident in the expression of his views. On Jan. 17, 2001, he told the German publication Die Welt, "There is not [even] the smallest indication of the existence of a Jewish Temple on this place in the past. In the whole city, there is not even a single stone indicating Jewish history... The Jews cannot legitimately claim [the Western] Wall, neither religiously nor historically. The Committee of the League of Nations recommended in 1930, to allow the Jews to pray there, in order to keep them quiet. But by no means did it acknowledge that the wall belongs to them."

Tayseer Tamimi, chief religious justice of the PA, told a television audience on June 9, 2009, "I know of Muslim and Christian holy sites in [Jerusalem]. I don't know of any Jewish holy sites in it... Israel has been excavating since 1967 in search of remains of their Temple or their fictitious Jewish history."

And so on.

An excellent account of this Palestinian revisionism has been written by Ricki Hollander for the Committee for Accuracy in Middle East Reporting in America (CAMERA). Dated July 6, 2009, it is titled The Battle Over Jerusalem and the Temple Mount.

The Arabs in Mandatory Palestine did not always deny a Jewish connection to Jerusalem. They recognized and understood the interconnection between Jewish, Christian and Muslim history. And they made no attempt to erase the Jewish part or indeed Judaism from the sequence of the establishment of the three monotheisms.

The Simon Wiesenthal Center has recently released a facsimile of the original 1924 English-language publication, A Brief Guide to Al-Haram Al-Sharif, prepared for and published by the Supreme Moslem Council in Jerusalem. It must be pointed out, too, that the head of the council at that time was the notorious Haj Amin al-Husseini, who later became Adolf Hitler's active and zealous ally in the campaign to annihilate Jews.

Al-Haram Al-Sharif translates from the Arabic as the August (or Noble) Sanctuary. It is the Arabic name for the Temple Mount. The document was intended as a guide for visitors unfamiliar with the religious and other sensibilities of the place.

The author(s) of the booklet very honestly states on page one, "[F]or the purposes of this guide, which confines itself to Muslim period, the starting point is the year 637 AD. In that year, the Caliph Omar occupied Jerusalem, and one of his first acts was to repair to this site, which had already become sacred in the eyes of Muslims."

But the immediately preceding sentence is quite instructive and definitive of the then-widely held view even by the Arabs there of the history of the August Sanctuary.

"The site is one of the oldest in the world. Its sanctity dates from the earliest times. Its identity with the site of Solomon's Temple is beyond dispute. [My emphasis] This, too, is the spot, according to universal belief, on which 'David built there an altar unto the Lord, and offered burnt offerings and peace offerings. (2 Samuel XXIV, 25)'"

Since the reunion – on the 28th day of Iyar during the Six Day War in 1967 – of east and west Jerusalem, of the Old City and the New City, the identity of the site has been in dispute. Since then, there has been a concerted and calculated campaign by Palestinian leaders to deny any Jewish link to the city of Jerusalem. Since then, too, we celebrate the 28th day of Iyar as Yom Yerushalayim, Jerusalem Day. It falls this year on May 12.

Palestinian leaders and even the British Advertising Standards Authority, we have learned in recent days, are striving to disconnect Jews from Jerusalem. We must oppose them. In some way, either with children, friends, colleagues or even in sole company, we must remember Jerusalem next week.

To do so is not an act of politics. It is a personal and national affirmation. It is even an affirmation of the history and the values of western civilization. There are very few higher causes right now.

CHILDREN SING AT QUEEN'S PARK

Grade 5, 6, and 7 members of Bialik Hebrew Day School's choir (seen below) were invited to sing at the Ontario legislature on April 26. The performance was part of an annual Canadian Society for Yad Vashem ceremony honouring Holocaust survivors.

SURVIVORS HONOURED

Premier Dalton McGuinty, second from right, joined the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem on April 26 in honouring 18 Holocaust survivors who have made contributions to their communities and Ontario. The premier, the consul general of Israel, Amir Gissin, second from left, Minister of Citizenship and Immigration Eric Hoskins (rear middle), and York Centre MPP Monte Kwinter, fourth from right, presented each honoree with a scroll. "Today we honour 18 Holocaust survivors whose journey out of that nightmare brought them to Ontario, to pursue the dream of a new life," McGuinty said. "Through hard work, through sacrifice, they have made that dream a reality. Ontario is much stronger for it." The survivors honoured were Luba Drewnowsky, Herschel Perl, Max T. Eisen, Itzhak Pilc, Syma and David Forberg, Rachel Piuti, Gertie (Gitla) Gotlieb, David and Zenia Rybowski, Alexander Levin, Maia Toivis, Ora Markstein, Manya and Herschel Wise, Leslie Meisels, Seymour Zweig and Joseph Peretz.

JIAS aims to help parents, teens

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

JIAS Toronto and Jewish Family & Child are planning a series of workshops on helping teens and parents deal with the common issues that young people face in today's world.

Joanna Sasson Morrison, co-ordinator of community development services at JIAS, said the workshops have come about as the result of an annual grant from the Ontario Ministry of Children and Youth Services aimed at potentially at-risk families.

Workshops planned for common issues facing young people

They are planning separate workshops for parents and teens, she said, in order to give teens a safe space away from their parents, where the teens can talk openly.

Shauna Sidney, co-ordinator of family life education at JF&CS, said the first workshop planned for adults, on May 27 and teens, on June 9, is on youth and the Internet.

"Being that computers are such a predominant factor in teens lives today, [we want] teens and their parents to become educated on the safe use of computers and the Internet, and be aware of some the dangers lurking," she said.

The May 27 panel includes Paul Gillespie, a former leader of the child exploitation section of the Toronto Police Services sex crime unit; Rhonda Polisuk, an elementary school principal; Harvey Dupras, a civil litigator and representative from beyondborders.org – Canada's global voice against child sexual exploitation – Howard Hurwitz, director of children's services at JF&CS, and Talyah Breslin, supervisor of child protection at JF&CS.

"We want to empower parents to have the right to monitor teens. When there are dangers involved, they should know that they have the right to keep [their children] safe," Sidney said.

Hurwitz said that many parents are unaware of the dangers that can exist online. "Kids as young as three years old are using the Internet, and young children have been lured by adult predators. We want to highlight this issue. We are presenting a great panel of experts, and it is vital for parents to attend."

Miri Ben-Dat, a social worker at JIAS, said that the grant is also being used to form a group aimed at teens ages 14 to 19 who are potentially at risk. "Many immigrant teens are trying to navigate our culture, and we want to help them adapt. By running this program, we hope to give them the necessary information to help them make smart choices."

A number of workshops will teach parents and teens about Internet safety. [Jeff Rosen photo]

At a special session on May 16, she said, a family life educator will talk about personal relationships and healthy sexual behaviour.

Sidney said that on Sept. 28 in York Region, a forum for parents about teens and drug use is in the planning stages.

"Family life educators in schools have reported that kids are nervous about [the prevalence] of drugs in high schools, and parents need to know about their concerns.

"The forum will include an educator who will talk about what is going on in York Region, a youth who will talk from a student's perspective and a parent."

She said that the two agencies are stretching their grant to the fullest. "We want to address sensitive topics, in order to keep youth safe and secure."

Getting to a place they had already passed

Diplomatic pronouncements emanated from the Middle East last weekend as if carried by continuous bursts of exploding hot air. A veritable flurry of press releases swirled across the wire services announcing the now settled expectation that Israelis and Palestinians would imminently resume talking about the possibility of a peace agreement. Though the talks will not be with each other, there will, however, be talks. Indeed they are rumoured to be scheduled to begin this month.

The list of communiqués was indeed impressive:

• The Arab League met on Saturday and gave its approval for the Palestinians to hold U.S.-mediated indirect negotiations with Israel.

• The Palestine Liberation Organization, (PLO) the largest constituent body of the Palestinian Authority (PA), announced it would meet this week to vote on proceeding with the indirect talks. PA President Mahmoud Abbas also announced that he will visit Washington later this month for talks with U.S. officials "to push the peace process forward."

The PLO and PA will of course approve entering indirect talks. The Arab League's blessing ensures the Arab-man-on-the-street will not be upset with the decision. Moreover, it's very likely that the Obama administration has made a commitment of some sort to the PA that the Palestinians are keeping in their back diplomatic pocket. They don't want to risk its fulfilment.

• After the Arab League's pronouncement, Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu praised the Arab League's decision. This was the springboard for the additional news that Netanyahu would visit Egypt this week to confer with Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak on the soon-to-be-restarted-albeit-indirect peace talks.

• And of course, fastening all of the statements in a tightly bound red, white and blue ribbon was the announcement that U.S. special envoy George Mitchell was expected to return to Israel this week to lay the ground rules for the indirect talks.

In the misery-focused theatre of Middle East diplomacy, the mere appearance of movement is celebrated as actual motion.

But let us not forget that it was the PA that stopped direct talks with Israel in December 2008. To that point, Palestinian leaders and Israeli leaders had been speaking directly, face to face, sitting across the table since 1993. After Netanyahu took office in March 2009, the PA hardened its refusal to negotiate by demanding that Israel first halt all construction in the West Bank and east Jerusalem.

And now, the spate of press releases celebrates the likelihood that the PA has finally agreed to indirect peace talks with Israel (i.e., with the United States). Israel and the PA appear to have arrived at a place that they had already passed as recently as 18 months ago.

Only in the Middle East can this be called progress.

Britain's rejection of Israel's ad

Your editorial on the regulatory agency of the British government nixing an Israel Government Tourist Office ad showing the Western Wall got the remedy right but missed the point ("Where dishonesty trumps fair play," April 22). You suggest that the controversy is a commercial speech issue, and a question of fact. They argue that it is a political issue, and the ad an international legal fraud on the people of Britain. They've got the issue – though not the part about the ad's legal accuracy – right. You don't.

This is a political issue for the simple reason that the British government has chosen to make it into one. That's why they are wrong to regulate it. The state has a business being in the business of the nation. It has no business protecting the public from political or legal controversy. Even the U.S. Supreme Court has held that commercial speech, as distinct from political speech, can be closely regulated to protect consumers against fraud and deceptive ads. Your citing of international law to prove the facts is irrelevant to this distinction. Law is not fact. It is about regulation of fact. And that is the point. The British government is misusing universally recognized state powers to regulate commercial speech to regulate the political views of the nation. That's the point.

The British government does not understand fundamental principles of freedom of speech, and its place in a democratic society. Neither it seems, I am sad to say, does your paper.

Editor's note: Our April 22 editorial incorrectly stated that the decision to ban an Israel Government Tourist Office ad depicting the Western Wall came from a regulatory agency of the British government. In fact, the Advertising Standards Authority is an independent, voluntary complaints body set up in 1962 by the advertising industry.

IAW is alienating people

Letter writer Gary Gerofsky is putting a damper on what is actually a real reason for Jewish university students to celebrate ("IAW is an intifadah against truth," letters, April 15). Israeli Apartheid Week was "milder" this year, pretty well across the board, i.e. all Canadian campuses. How can Gerofsky say that the IAW campaign is growing more professional when observation showed that at some places, such as York University, it was practically non-existent? They did not even have a table set up, while pro-Israel groups had three tables in Vari Hall. IAW is not, and never has been, "very slick." According to Barry Rubin, a writer on international affairs, the very stridency of the IAW movement is alienating all but the already committed. However, I agree with Gerofsky that we must never stop fighting campaigns like IAW.

Party's platform like National Socialism

Letter writer Ishay Friedman is dead wrong about the ultra-right-wing Jobbik party in Hungary ("The left is the right in Hungary, April 22). Please don't be misled, no matter how much one is an opponent of the political left. I have been listening, in Hungarian, to the various speeches of Jobbik's leader, Gábor Vona, and Krisztina Morvai, who is one of Jobbik's three European Parliament members, and their platform sounds very much like National Socialism, with a good deal of "Christian" and "pure" Hungarian values mixed in. We all know from a sorrowful history what that stood for in the past. Not to mention their hook-up with the banned Magyar Gárda, a semi-military group that is parading openly, intimidating the Roma population and Jews, and is reminiscent of the late, but not dead, Arrow Cross hooligans of yesteryear.

'Evil is real. So is good. There is a choice.'

By GARY GOLDBERG

The 2010 March of the Living is a two-week odyssey that is truly a trip of a lifetime. It included a week of remembrance and learning in Poland, followed by a week of renewal and celebration in Israel.

Six hundred participants from across Canada, representing three generations, journeyed together. Most significant was the group of octogenarian Holocaust survivors who are so committed to this program that several have accompanied as many as 10 trips to date.

The chaperone leaders who supervise the student participants and support the survivor docents are omnipresent and indefatigable.

Grade 11 students constituted the vast majority and core of our delegation. "This is the last generation to hear the stories of the Holocaust directly from the survivors themselves," Eli Rubenstein, national director of the March of the Living program, said. "Thus it is both a privilege and an obligation for these young people to listen to, and learn from, the stories of the survivors. In the time, when the survivors can no longer tell their stories, they will be the 'witnesses for the witnesses.'"

This year, an adult group of 36 people – many of whom like my wife, Linda, and me, are children of Holocaust survivors – was included. We travelled on a concurrent itinerary, joining the students at many sites and for all major events.

The principal activities in Poland included visits to various sites that are vestiges of a once-vibrant Jewish community that existed for 1,000 years. Three-and-a-half million Jews lived in Poland before 1939, when one in three people in Warsaw was Jewish.

We were overwhelmed by the magnitude of the current voids and the significance of what once was, but is now absent.

To enrich our learning, each participant received a personal diary that contained information about the sites that we would visit; Poland and its history; the Jewish community of Poland before World War II; the Holocaust; Canada's role in World War II, and the history of Zionism and Israel. The diary's opening page includes the "10 goals of the March of the Living," as well as a "pledge" of commitment to increase one's knowledge of our history and heritage and to actively participate in the fight against every form of discrimination manifested against any religion, nationality or ethnic group.

A cataclysmic political event occurred the day after our arrival in Poland. A plane carrying Polish President Lech Kaczynski and a large delegation of Poland's leaders crashed. They were en route to Russia to attend a memorial service for 22,000 Poles massacred in Katyn, Russia, by Soviet secret police during World War II.

A week-long national state of mourning for those killed in the crash left a palpable pall of grief over the country. This profoundly influenced our perceptions and interactions. There was silence in the streets, and numerous memorial services and public vigils took place. The Polish people manifested a will to survive as a stable democratic nation.

The obligation to remember burdened each of us who walked the hallowed ground of the concentration camps and witnessed the symbols of despair and destruction – the barbed wire; the barracks; the warehouses of shoes and personal items; the community marker stones at Treblinka; and perhaps most powerfully, the crematorium and the monument of ashes in Majdanek. Amid the silence, we recited Kaddish.

On Yom Hashoah, the actual March of the Living brought 10,000 people together from around the world, including this year, 2,000 Polish participants who joined in silent solidarity. We gathered inside Auschwitz, each with an identification tag listing the individual for whom we marched.

Upon hearing the shrill blast of the shofar, we began to pass under the infamous sign, "Arbeit Macht Frei" – knowing it had recently been stolen, and fortunately recovered – on the way out of the Auschwitz camp for the melancholy three-kilometre march. An extended column of blue and white traversed the rail lines to the collapsed crematoria at Birkenau, where the formal memorial ceremony was held.

We heard names read and realized that that each person who was killed had a family and a story. As Liberal MP Irwin Cotler said to the March of the Living gathering in 2009, the Nazi genocide was "too terrible to imagine, but not too terrible to have happened."

The survivors shared their stories. The entire group of Holocaust survivors demonstrated an edifying ability to see the positive. Despite their formative first-hand exposure to human depravity, they remain motivated by the need to create not destroy, to love not to hate. We were, and continue to be, inspired by them.

The sun shines through an Israeli flag held by two participants on the March of the Living last month in Poland. [Photo courtesy of the March of the Living]

Activist and writer Elie Wiesel wrote: "I do not live in the past, but the past lives in me."

I remain haunted by the experience of visiting the concentration camps and the admonishment of philosopher George Santayana: "Those who cannot learn from history are doomed to repeat it." Recall, recount, remember. We struggle with this onerous challenge.

The trip is designed not just to expose the young people to the evil and extent of the Holocaust, but also to teach them about the diversity of Jewish life that existed before the Shoah, the courage of those who resisted Nazi tyranny, the heroic actions of the righteous, the strength of the survivors to rebuild their lives after the Holocaust and an appreciation of what Israel is.

A massive volcanic eruption in Iceland filled the air over Poland with a different type of smoke and ash when we were there, bringing air traffic to a halt in Europe. Our groups were fortunate to be able to leave on the last flights before the lengthy closure of the Warsaw airport. We left Poland for Israel with a new understanding of what it means to remember, to witness, to live.

We arrived in Israel at 4:30 a.m. and headed to Jaffa to observe the dawn over Tel Aviv's magnificent modern skyline, which sparkled in the sunshine. These downtown towers are the monuments of the Jewish rebirth – alive and flourishing. They stand in vivid contrast to the gravestones and the monuments to the past that we visited in Poland.

We understand that though we cannot change the past, we can create the future. One hums the words of the Israeli national anthem, Hatikvah: "We haven't lost our hope, of 2,000 years, to be a free people in our own land".

The most powerful and moving event for me in Israel was the Yom Hazikaron ceremony at Ammunition Hill memorial park in Jerusalem. The following morning, we visited Yad Vashem and its Valley of the (Lost) Communities. We were adjacent to Mount Herzl cemetery when a mournful siren marked the solemn minutes of public silence in recognition of the fallen.

The March of the Living is aptly named, for it's more about life than about death.

We began by being exposed to the blackness of what transpired during the Holocaust, but concluded the trip with flags flying and the joy and excitement of Yom Ha'aztmaut. The ubiquitous fireworks displays reminded us of the sights and sounds of the many battles that have been fought in the last 62 years to establish, protect and preserve the Jewish state.

We learn from history by observing and considering it. But knowledge without understanding is insufficient. Understanding without action is wasted. We must continue to ask this question, "Why?" Why is there discrimination, hatred, tyranny, and mass murder of innocent people? We do not require a definitive answer in order to act in response to these threats.

There is in society a long inventory and continuum of hate – teasing, bullying, demonizing, dehumanizing, violence and murder. How do we respond? Hatred deserves overt opposition: not indifference, politesse, avoidance or complicity. "Reactivity," not passivity. In the words of Auschwitz survivor Hugo Gryn, "Evil is real. So is good. There is a choice."

We returned from the March and reverted to our daily lives and concerns. The participants are now more informed about the history of the Holocaust, have a renewed sense of Jewish identity and an intensified connection to Israel, and an awareness of the importance of fighting injustice, prejudice and hatred.

The key lesson that I learned from the March of the Living experience, at which we studied the past to prepare ourselves for the future, is that we must act to challenge, to confront and to oppose the elements in our society that threaten humane and democratic values wherever they are endangered.

I believe that our future community leadership will be a group of young people whose dedication was ignited by their experience on the March of the Living, who engender a sense of responsibility for one another. "Kol Yisrael aravim ze le ze." We are the guarantors of one another's destiny.

The participants on the March of the Living have learned important lessons from that experience about how to live. Am Yisrael Chai. The people of Israel live.

Opinions

Lighting a candle in the dark

Why do you believe in God?

Most of the year, the answer is obvious: the world is a shining example of divine creativity. Philosophers call this the "teleological argument" for God, and indeed, during the summer twilight, you cannot fail but to be moved by the living poetry of the natural order, the divine harmony of birds, crickets and rustling leaves.

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

But on Yom Hashoah, this argument collapses. It's not only the deaths of six million people that overwhelm us; it's the barbarity with which they were murdered. The Polish resistance leader Jan Karski reported on how a group of 120 Jews were forced into a small train car. On the floor was quicklime, which generates enormous heat when mixed with water. The sweat dripping down caused the quicklime to bubble, and slowly, the people began to burn. These poor victims cried in agony for a day until they met their inevitable deaths.

How can one believe in God when such evil stalks the earth?

In the dark shadows of the Holocaust, faith becomes a painful question rather than an easy answer.

However, we still teach, talk and think about the Holocaust. We even send teenagers to visit concentration camps on the March of the Living.

Presumably, exposing gentle students to the Holocaust should leave them cynical and bitter. But strangely enough, the students return inspired. They confront darkness and horror, yet they walk away with a spiritual experience. Why does this happen?

Because man instinctively resists evil. The darkness of evil pushes our souls to respond. The Bible says that "man's soul is God's candle," and deep inside, our souls hunt for righteousness. (Yes, this is still true despite the fact that the Nazis corrupted the image of God, burying their souls under a miasma of evil.)

Even in the desperation of the death camps, there were heroes of kindness, like the man who saved Mayer Schondorf's life. During a death march, Mayer's cap blew off. Frozen and broken, Mayer wanted to step out of line and get shot by the guards. The man behind him encouraged Mayer to hold on, and when they passed a corpse at the side of the road, this man risked his life to grab the corpse's cap and give it to Mayer. Enveloped by cruelty, this anonymous hero lit a candle of kindness.

When surrounded by evil, belief comes from within. Repulsed, our spirits demand that we transform the world. And that impulse to do good is powerful evidence of the divine spirit within.

Our souls, God's candles on earth, can still light the path of faith in the darkest of places.

Balance the tears with triumph

Remarks delivered to Canadian March of the Living delegates at the April 19 ceremony marking the transition from Yom Hazikaron to Yom Ha'atzmaut.

I'm confused. I must admit that after this moving ceremony, I don't know whether to laugh or cry. I'm sure many of you have shed your share of tears both over the unfathomable losses during the Shoah in Europe and the painful losses experienced right here in Israel. But in the wake of the Holocaust, never give up an opportunity to laugh. Laughter is one of the many things the Nazis tried stealing from us. In the classic Christmas movie It's a Wonderful Life, we learn that some Christians believe that every time a bell rings another angel earns his wings. I say: every time a Jew laughs, the Nazis lose once again, and Hell burns just a little hotter for Hitler and his henchmen.

Gil Troy in Montreal

But think about it: how do you explain a trip that includes a visit to Auschwitz, the ultimate death camp, and celebrates Israeli Independence Day at Mini-Israel, which is basically a theme park? And which better reflects the human condition and Jewish history, the horror show or the funhouse? The answer of course, is "yes," both. And that is our challenge, as we turn on a dime to go from Yom Hazikaron to Yom Ha'atzmaut, and as you return home to redefine your Jewish identity and your Jewish commitments following this extraordinary Jewish journey you just took.

Whenever I meet students at the gates just outside Jerusalem's Old City, I invite them to enter the Old City with someone on their shoulder. It could be a grandparent who dreamed of making it to Jerusalem and never did. It could be a historic figure like King David or King Solomon, who built the place. It could be a Holocaust victim whose plans to visit were cut short.

And I know on this trip you have been introduced to "individual" stories to help personalize and internalize this greatest crime in human history – otherwise the enormity is overwhelming.

As you go home – and you will get home despite the volcanic ash – remember you have two shoulders. On one, place a victim. On the other, place a victor. On one place a symbol of the traumas of Jewish history. On another place a symbol of the triumphs. Don't just remember Auschwitz, remember Mini-Israel. Don't just remember the crimes of history, remember how far you have journeyed from Auschwitz to Jerusalem, how far we have journeyed in 62 years. Remember the heroes of Latrun and the everyday heroism it sometimes takes to be Israeli surrounded by so many enemies.

Remember, history hurts, but also history heals. History healed those who survived the ashes to build the Jewish state. History healed those who survived the Arab onslaught in 1948 to make this state thrive. History healed our people, who, by tapping into the power of Zionism, the power of Jewish statehood, balanced the vale of tears with the tales of triumph.

I end – as a good professor should – by giving you homework. Don't let this experience end when you arrive home. And if I bump into you on the streets of Montreal or Toronto or Jerusalem in the next few weeks, don't tell me how meaningful this experience was. What I want you to do is go home and become change agents in your Jewish communities back home. I want you to become Jewishly ambitious, setting Jewish goals for yourself just as you – and your parents – set academic goals and career goals. I want you to become good Jewish citizens and write a glorious new chapter in Jewish history.

I want to bump into you a year, two years, 10 years from now. Then, I will want to hear what a meaningful experience this was. But that will only happen if you learn from the heroes who made this state: seize the moment, make history happen, make history heal, make your community better, make your Jewish experience valuable. Chag Samayach.

Toward a renewed Zionism

I love talking to Israeli taxi drivers. They know everything about everyone and everything. They're psychologists, political analysts, archeologists, historians and philosophers. Just open up with "Nu, mah yihyeh?" ("Nu, what will be?") and you're in for a real ride.

The other day, I had quite a long ride, so there was a lot of time to reflect with the driver on the upcoming holidays of Yom Hazikaron and Yom Ha'atzmaut.

Rabbi Elyse Goldstein in Jerusalem

Like most Israelis, he was engaged in a general national stock-taking. Newspapers and radios asked hard existential questions about Israeli self-identity, Zionism, patriotism, war, peace, compromise, achievement, and missed opportunities.

When I asked him "what will be," he shared with me a long, sad list of the woes of Israeli society: the rudeness of Israeli kids; the tedious and inane bureaucracies; the tensions between Jew and Arab, religious and secular, Ashkenazi and Sephardi; and the scandal of government officials who take bribes and sexually harass and exploit their own workers and openly practice the "protectzia" of giving jobs to family and friends.

He got angry about the mess that would be left over after all the Independence Day picnics and felt depressed about the chances for peace. He lamented the loss of the neighbourhoods of his youth, where everyone knew each other and shared in joys and sorrows. He remembered the days when Zionist ideology was the binding cord of Israeli life.

He asked, "Maybe that was the Israel that was? Like the kibbutz which has privatized and is now a five-star hotel with a spa, there is nothing wrong with change," he said, "except when we get stuck and can't handle the Israel that is." And then, with a long sigh, he added, "But I love Eretz Yisrael. It's like a marriage – I'm in it for the long run, and even when it's far from perfect, I am still committed to it."

One sees that commitment in a different way in Israel than in the Diaspora on Yom Hazikaron and Yom Ha'atzmaut. I will never forget the 11 a.m. siren and the freeze-frame of activity on the streets and roads, as Israelis stopped to remember the nation's fallen soldiers on Yom Hazikaron, and the unbelievable emotion of going to Har Herzl to place flowers on the graves of young people I've never met, along with tens of thousands of other Israelis.

And then came Yom Ha'atzmaut – when the streets were alive with dancing and singing until the wee hours of the morning, with fireworks every hour, and street fairs and festivals, and everyone wearing blue and white.

The festive feeling runs deep, and there's a gushing, rushing sense of exhilaration and pride that makes you want to hug perfect strangers and cry with joy. But all of this comes with an underlying seriousness about the national "project" of Zionism. Even during the barbecues, we asked each other: How are we doing? Why isn't it working the way it should? What does it mean to be a democratic Jewish state? Why is it so hard so much of the time? And why do we still love it so much?

Israel isn't a "young state" anymore, a baby nation made up of survivors and chalutzim with nowhere else to go, but a nation with 62 years of experience. We love it still, but we need to have a deeper reason than "because we have nowhere else to go" or "because it's my home" or "because I love being able to eat out on Passover."

It's become clear that what's needed for the future is a renewed Zionist ideology that stems from strength of purpose, clear vision, collaborative dream-building, and leadership that galvanizes – a renewed Zionism that engages people in the "project" of nationhood and the goal of mature statehood, and a renewed Zionism that inspires even thoughtful, yet cynical, Israeli taxi drivers.

The Kirshner File

The making of Nuremberg

Sandra Schulberg's five-year quest to restore a historically important documentary about the Nuremberg Nazi war crimes trial, one of the greatest courtroom dramas in modern history, was a labour of love.

The film, Nuremberg: Its Lessons For Today, which was screened recently at the Toronto Jewish Film Festival, captivated her in no small part due to the fact that it was made by her late father, Stuart, who went on to forge a successful career as a television producer in the United States.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Commissioned by the U.S. War Department and the American military government in occupied Germany, the movie was completed in 1948 and widely shown in western Germany.

For a variety of reasons, the U.S. government blocked its distribution to American theatres, thereby consigning it to obscurity until Sandra Schulberg and her colleague, Josh Waletzky, came along to rescue it from gathering further dust.

Premiered in Holland last November in conjunction with a ceremony in The Hague in which Nuremberg prosecutor Benjamin Ferencz was awarded the Dutch equivalent of the Nobel Prize, Nuremberg was subsequently shown to 450 high school students in Germany. Schulberg, who is based in New York City, recalls that particular screening with poignancy.

As she put it, "Although Germany does a good job of educating its youth about World War II and the Holocaust, I think the film was a revelation to the 16- and 17-year-old kids who saw it. I told them that they were completely innocent of any of the crimes portrayed in the film, and that they and their fellow teenagers outside Germany were the hope of the world and that it was up to them to wear the mantle of the Nuremberg legacy and fight for peace and justice."

After being presented at the Berlin Film Festival last winter and receiving its North American premiere in Toronto this past April, Nuremberg is scheduled to appear at the Jerusalem Film Festival in mid-July, followed by its general release in the United States in September.

As Schulberg suggests, the story of how this film came to be made is the stuff of post-war politics and intrigue. While preparing for the Nuremberg tribunal – which convened on Nov. 20, 1945 and ended on Oct. 1, 1946 – the lead U.S. prosecutor, U.S. Supreme Court Justice Robert H. Jackson, decided to use film and photographic evidence to convict the Nazi war criminals on trial. Among a group of 23 defendants, they included Hermann Goring, Adolf Hitler's second-in-command, and Albert Speer, the minister of armaments and production.

Jackson believed that a cinematic account of the trial and of the rise and fall of Nazi Germany would achieve two related objectives: to show the German public that the Nazi leadership had been treated fairly, and to leave a permanent record of Nazi aggression and crimes against humanity.

A special U.S. film team run by the Office of Strategic Services, the predecessor of the Central Intelligence Agency, was formed for this purpose under the direction of the Hollywood director, John Ford, whose critically acclaimed movies ran the gamut from Stagecoach to How Green Was My Valley.

Assigned to Ford's team were, among others, Stuart Schulberg and his older brother, Budd, whose iconic novel, What Makes Sammy Run?, had been published in 1941. They were the sons of former Paramount studio chief B.P. Schulberg.

Sandra Schulberg

The brothers were not unknown quantities to Ford. During the war, Stuart served with the OSS' photographic branch, which was headed by Ford. Animated by Jackson's request, Ford dispatched Stuart to Europe in the summer of 1945 to acquire incriminating Nazi film footage that could be used at the forthcoming Nuremberg trial.

Budd joined the hunt, and during the next four months, the Schulbergs and their colleagues found what they needed, including the photo archives of Heinrich Hoffmann, Hitler's personal photographer.

Stuart wrote and directed Nuremberg – the official documentary about the trial – while his colleague, Joseph Zigman, edited it. Eric Pommer, the producer of the Weimar-era film, The Blue Angel, supervised the production. Excerpts from two American films, The Nazi Plan and Nazi Concentration Camps, were incorporated into Nuremberg.

Stuart Schulberg during World War II

Seventy-eight minutes in length, Nuremberg would be an integral component of the U.S. de-Nazification campaign, such as it was, in postwar Germany. Shown to a German audience for the first time in Stuttgart in November 1948, it was then exhibited around Germany over the next year and a half, eliciting a wide range of reactions.

In a reflection of its looming rivalry with the United States during the Cold War period, the Soviet Union produced its own documentary on the trial, Judgment of the People.

Much to Stuart's probable disappointment, Nuremberg was shelved after its screening in Germany. John Norris, an American reporter on the staff of the Washington Post, investigated the U.S. government's decision, but he never really got to the bottom of it. Nor could he establish why the United States refused to sell the film to Pare Lorentz, an American producer. Later, Norris concluded that Nuremberg had been filed away because the Truman administration feared that it might cause a backlash in Germany and interfere with the U.S. goal of rebuilding Germany's economy through the Marshall Plan.

With Nuremberg suppressed, Stuart continued to produce de-Nazification films for the U.S. military government's documentary film unit in Berlin. During the early 1950s, he and a partner produced feature films in western Germany. Subsequently, he was recruited to administer the Marshall Plan's motion picture section in Paris, where Sandra Schulberg was born.

In 1956, having returned to the United States, he and Budd made Wind Across the Everglades, a feature film, for Warner Brothers. Returning to the documentary form in 1961, he joined David Brinkley's Journal, the first TV news magazine program. In 1969, he was hired as the producer of NBC's Today show. He died in 1979 at the age of 56 while producing an NBC special.

To Sandra Schulberg's regret, she never discussed her father's early projects, including Nuremberg, with him. But after being asked by an American film scholar how his de-Nazification films had influenced his career at NBC, Schulberg – a seasoned producer and film financier – took a new-found interest in his work.

Six years ago, the director of the Berlin Film Festival asked Schulberg to curate a series on the Marshall Plan films that her dad had supervised. He proposed launching it with Nuremberg, which she had never seen.

As a result of these deliberations, Schulberg became interested in her father's film, the original picture negative and sound elements of which were lost or destroyed.

She and Waletzky – a documentary film director, editor and writer – created a new 35mm negative and reconstructed the soundtrack.

The restoration, which cost just under $200,000, allows audiences to hear Jackson's opening and closing statements as well as the testimony of the Nazi defendants and their defence lawyers.

She is pleased with the film, saying it stands as a dire warning to politicians and nations planning and waging what Jackson described as "aggressive war."

But she is sorry that her uncle Budd did not live to see Nuremberg. "I'm sad he died eight weeks before I could show him the first print," she said. "But he knew I was very close, and I think he was proud."

It makes me feel good to share and recommend Romspen.

My brother turned me on to this unheard of mortgage investment company almost 20 years ago. Being cautious, I put in small amounts of money to test the waters. The waters have been flowing ever since. My investments in the Romspen Fund are as good as the 30 year business investment I have with my partners, who of course have become Romspen investors as well. It makes me feel good to share and recommend this to my friends and to my kids. After all, why shouldn't they be in on a good thing?

Holy Blossom cantor to be feted May 11

30 years of service at Holy Blossom

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Cantor Benjamin Z. Maissner – known familiarly as Beny – will be honoured at a gala evening May 11 at the Royal Conservatory TELUS Centre for Performance and Learning's Koerner Hall.

Along with Maissner's choirs, and cantors he has mentored, the 11 other performers at the event – most of whom have a personal connection with him – will include Colm Wilkinson, Michael Burgess, Joshua Nelson, Amy Sky, Theresa Tova, Daniel Domb and Ofra Harnoy.

Maissner, 65, has been cantor and musical director of Holy Blossom Temple for 30 years. A native of Israel, he was a child cantor who grew up in a family he describes as modern Orthodox.

His uncle, Israel Alter, the former chief cantor of Hanover and later a faculty member at Hebrew Union College (HUC) in New York, was Maissner's role model, he told The CJN in his spacious second-floor office at the temple.

When Maissner decided he wanted to study chazzanut, HUC was thus "the more natural place to go," he said.

Maissner – a classically trained lyric tenor – got his start at an egalitarian synagogue in Philadelphia, but says he found his home at Holy Blossom after he became cantor there in July 1979. The synagogue, he added is "much more traditional" than a typical Reform congregation.

With his Orthodox background and two daughters who are Orthodox (he also has a son), Maissner says he lives in two worlds. "I live a traditional life," he said, adding that he studies once a week at an Orthodox yeshiva.

"I'm very proud of being [at Holy Blossom], but I'm very comfortable in the Orthodox [milieu]."

At Holy Blossom, Maissner said that – with the support of the congregation's rabbis, who "saw the virtue of maintaining the high level of music and striving to create participating congregations" – he has been able to "galvanize the congregation into a very unique way of worship," and teach them to daven and participate.

He works with both a professional and a volunteer choir at the synagogue, where "music is very important." As well, he noted, "worship in the sense of community participation is very important to me.

"People do not know what Reform can be, and what Reform is."

Outside of the synagogue, his musical tastes run from "Renaissance all the way to acid rock," and he leads the Lachan Toronto Jewish Chamber Choir, named for his uncle's 1950s-era musical organization. The choir has sung in North America, Shanghai and Nuremberg, Germany.

Cantor Benjamin Maissner

"It's my own dream of promoting high-class Jewish music, not necessarily liturgical," he said. The group's music dates as far back as the 12th century.

Maissner's office – where he has trained at least half a dozen of the city's cantors and others occupying major pulpits elsewhere – is lined with books, CDs, artwork and documents acquired over the course of his career, among them two honorary doctorates of music, from the Jewish Theological Seminary and Hebrew Union College, his master's of music degree from Temple University, and a 2004 Choir Olympics poster from Bremen.

In addition to the gala, Holy Blossom will establish a music archive and library in Maissner's name, which will include recordings of ancient Sephardi and Ashkenazi music, compositions and scores by Maissner, by the temple's former musical director and composer Ben Steinberg and by other Jewish musicians.

Greater Toronto Area

Rothschilds to be honoured by Eitz Chaim

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Toronto philanthropist Kurt Rothschild and his wife, Edith, will be the guests of honour at Eitz Chaim Schools' annual dinner May 16.

The event, at Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto Congregation, will feature speaker Rabbi Yissocher Frand of Ner Israel Rabbinical College in Baltimore.

Rothschild, a board member at the school for almost 50 years, is chair of the World Mizrachi Organization and has served on the boards of a wide range of communal organizations including the Jewish Agency, Israel Bonds, the Jewish National Fund, Canadian Jewish Congress, and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. His interest in education extends to post-secondary institutions such as Yeshiva University, Bar-Ilan University and a large hesder yeshiva in Israel.

"Everyone knows that Kurt will never turn down someone with genuine needs," said UJA Federation's Howard English. "Either he will provide personal financial support, or ask his vast network of friends and contacts to do so – usually both."

When reached in his Toronto office last week, Rothschild apologized for not being available sooner. "I'm going meshuge here. There are so many calls."

Edith and Kurt Rothschild

Rothschild's involvement with Eitz Chaim – the second-oldest Jewish day school in Toronto, with 850 students on three campuses – stems from "its approach to Torah education and general education," which reflects his own philosophy emphasizing both Torah and worldly knowledge.

A native of Cologne, Germany, where he was raised in a modern Orthodox home, Rothschild completed high school in London, England, before going to work in an electrical shop there.

He was interned in England with several thousand other young German Jews and sent to Canada, where he spent two years in an internment camp near Fredericton. Later, he studied electrical engineering at Queen's University.

In the past five decades, the retired businessman – who until 1987 owned a national electrical mechanical consulting company – has seen growth at the school, particularly in its attention to the needs of students requiring special education.

He has also seen much growth in Jewish education in Toronto. "It encompasses a much wider range of the community, and is more focused in the different streams of Judaism, like Reform, Conservative, modern Orthodox, and haredi," he said.

Rothschild believes this has been a positive development "because it [allowed] each segment to educate their children along the lines which they would like."

As well, he added, he would not want to "blur the ideology" that separates those parts of the Jewish community, but at the same time, he would like to see "cordial understanding within the framework of their own worldview.

"I believe in mutual courtesy, understanding and all the things that bind us as being good Jews and good citizens, and loyal to the State of Israel."

Rothschild sees his community involvement as "a very good second career in my life... It gives me satisfaction to be of use to the community and to many private individuals who need help, particularly to help facilitate education of youngsters in Canada and Israel.

"I'm very interested in the welfare of the world Jewish community, and specifically in the physical and communal welfare of Israel."

A senior citizen "by a long shot," Rothschild said that, based on his age alone – which he declined to divulge – "I should take it a lot easier."

Community 'heroes' receive inclusion awards

By JENNIFER M. MACLEOD
Special to the CJN

Community heroes too often go unthanked. Recently, a few were singled out at the recent awards reception for Itanu Toronto, the inclusion initiative of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

The Community Inclusion Awards of Excellence honour individuals, organizations and programs that have made a difference in the GTA. Recipients for 2010 are Bnei Akiva of Toronto, Beth Torah Congregation, and Dara Kahane, director of Bayview Glen Day Camp.

Survey aims to help those with disabilities

please see page 32

Beth Torah's Rabbi Yossi Sapirman, speaking at the April 22 awards reception, accepted his award with humility, reiterating his congregation's commitment to inclusiveness, regardless of physical, mental or intellectual disability, race, culture, sexual orientation or any other difference.

Sapirman spoke of the distinction between accessibility and inclusion. "If we are accessible but not inclusive, or inclusive but not accessible, can we really call ourselves a community?"

He thanked participants who attend from a Reena group home and who, he says, have inspired others with their "enthusiasm for being Jewish and their deep desire to participate fully. That aspiration has become our sacred commitment."

The dessert reception, held at the CNIB building on Bayview, was itself a model event: beyond Braille signage and wheelchair accessibility, speakers were captioned on a prominent display screen, and the program was printed in a large, clear, legible font.

The evening included introductory remarks from Ontario's lieutenant-governor, David Onley. Onley, who uses a wheelchair as a result of childhood polio, has championed accessibility throughout his career in the public eye, first as a broadcaster and later in his present role.

He pointed out that while individuals with disabilities now have "easy physical access to fast food and hardware stores," they still too often have little or difficult "access to places of spiritual worship."

Onley challenged the Jewish community to do more than simply provide services, but rather, change attitudes toward those who are different. He commended the UJA for its "vision of a more inclusive Jewish community" and its ongoing commitment to breaking down "unwitting but powerful barriers."

Barriers aren't always visible. A youth group may seem diverse, but neglect the social and spiritual needs of children with intellectual disabilities. Through its Shevet Yuval program, Bnei Akiva of Toronto, part of an international religious Zionist youth organization, aims to "take away the idea of 'doing chesed,'" according to leader James Williams, and replace it with one of sincere friendship.

Keynote speaker Ellen Schwartz, right, presents a copy of her book, Lessons from Jacob, to Bnei Akiva representative Margalit Bernstein.

"People are excited to see [the Shevet Yuval kids]," he says. "People will go out of their way to contact them during the week."

The group holds Shabbatons and weekly learning programs at which every child – regardless of ability – is welcomed. Williams says there are also plans to incorporate further projects with other organizations such as Reena and Bloorview, which operates a children's rehabilitation hospital and provides in-school programs for children and youth with special needs.

Key to Bnei Akiva's success have been training programs providing youth leaders with skills in facilitating diverse groups. "When our staff run programs, it's at a level where everybody in the room, whatever disability you do or don't have, can gain something from the program."

A similar attitude can be seen at Bayview Glen Day Camp, under the leadership of director Dara Kahane. Through its Sunshine program, which integrates special-needs kids into the regular camp program, Kahane says camp becomes a "safe place," for children who often face extreme challenges in their day-to-day lives: it gives them "a chance to be like everybody else."

Though children or even adults who see the treatment offered to special-needs kids may say, "that's not fair," for Kahane, fair is "not giving everybody the same thing; fair is giving everybody what they need."

One camper for whom Bayview Glen has made a difference is Jacob Schwartz. Jacob was diagnosed as a newborn with Canavan disease, and doctors told his parents he would never sit up, speak, see or eat. They also said he probably wouldn't live much beyond his third birthday.

His mother, Ellen Schwartz, author of the book Lessons from Jacob, was the keynote speaker at the awards event, and talked not only of her family's trials – such as Jacob's seven brain surgeries before his fourth birthday – but also of moments when she can sit back and enjoy Jacob's sunny, appreciative disposition, and the fact that, against all odds, family and friends will celebrate his bar mitzvah this month.

Herself an unsung community hero who has founded an organization, Jacob's Ladder, and raised $2 million toward research and awareness of neurodegenerative diseases, Schwartz called on the Jewish community to "celebrate our special society, open up our minds to a completely different world… a better world."

Attendees at the awards evening, including Beth David's Cheryl Katz, are bringing that message back to their own congregations. "We have to be able to accommodate people." In Ontario, inclusion will become the law in January 2012, requiring synagogues and other organizations to meet provincial accessibility standards. "It's more than just barrier-free – it's how we include other people."

Others, like elementary-school principal Debbie Donsky, are spreading the word beyond the Jewish community. "It's not just the idea of tolerance," says Donsky, who once worked at Bayview Glen, attended to support Kahane. "Both sides have assets… Everyone is welcome, everyone learns from each other."

Representatives of Bnei Akiva of Toronto accept their Community Inclusion Award of Excellence.

Past award recipients have included Reena's Sandy Keshen, Camp George, Chabad-Lubavitch and the late Rabbi Joseph Kelman, who received a lifetime achievement award for nearly 50 years of advocacy for children with developmental disabilities.

The awards evening was the culmination of Community Inclusion Week 2010, which began with the city-wide Shabbat Itanu on April 17 and included other events such as film screenings and lectures.

Media personalities rock out for charities

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Michelle Dubé may be a CTV reporter, but she could have been a rock star. Sort of.

Dressed in a wedding veil and clutching a plastic guitar, Dubé and other members of the media helped launch the Sunnybrook Foundation and Canadian Hadassah WIZO's (CHW) newest fundraiser with the media Top Rock Stars challenge, a video game competition.

"First of all, it's for a good cause, but you get to rock out," said Dubé, who performed Billy Idol's White Wedding with her CTV team on the video game Rock Band. "I just thought it'd be the best way to do something for the community."

The video game competition, held at Toronto's Eaton Centre, was a way of promoting Funday Sunday, an all-day event to be held on Nov. 28 at the Metro Toronto Convention Centre.

The day will include a marketplace, games and Toronto's Top Rock Stars, a Rock Band competition for people of all ages. All proceeds will go toward Sunnybrook's women and babies program and CHW's initiatives in Israel, which include helping day cares, sheltering teens in distress and protecting women from domestic violence through shelters.

For Sarah Granatowicz, president of CHW Toronto, an organization that supports women and children in Israel and Canada, Rock Band was a good way to launch the fundraiser.

Today's Parent* was one of four media organizations involved in the CHW and Sunnybrook Foundation's media Top Rock Stars challenge, which helped launch their new fundraiser, Funday Sunday. From left, Gillian Chassels, Sara Smith, Dave Curcio and Sandra Martin.

"We thought we needed a new event... we're trying to do something big to engage all CHW families," Granatowicz said. "We need to attract young people. This [Rock Band] is the fashion right now."

Jeff O'Hagan, the CEO of the Sunnybrook Foundation, sees the fundraiser as a fun way to help two important organizations.

"I think it's something people can get involved with. It's a bit of a competition, but it's a fun competition," he said of the Rock Band element, adding that CHW and Sunnybrook's fundraising goal is a total of $300,000 by the end of Funday Sunday. Those participating in Toronto's Top Rock Stars will have until November to collect donations.

"It's a big job, but we want to make it fun. We want to get the message out to the community," he said; explaining that including the media in the competition was a way to get their message to the public.

Judges for last week's media Rock Band competition included Erica Ehm, founder of YummyMummyClub.ca, Eric Alper of E! Entertainment, and Cleopatra Williams and Jade Elliot, two cast members from Jersey Boys.

Staff from the Toronto Star, CTV, Today's Parent and Flow 93.5 FM participated, with Flow 93.5 taking top place.

For Dubé, performing onstage wasn't as easy as she thought.

"It was... nerve wracking. I practised all weekend. I didn't want to let my band down," she said. "We're all adults playing a kid's game... This is how you catch people's attention. Everyone's hearing the music, you can't help but stop and have a look."

Descendant of Chinese Jews to lecture in Toronto

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

As a descendant of Jews, Shi Lei always knew he was different.

"I was a little boy when I learned of this," Shi said in an interview from his home in Kaifeng, China. "But I didn't know what it meant. As I grew older and read, I began to know something about the Jewish people."

Shi, a 31-year-old tour guide, will deliver a lecture on Chinese Jews at Congregation Darchei Noam on May 13 at 7:30 p.m.

Shi's ancestors were Persian Jewish cotton merchants and traders who arrived in Kaifeng about 1,000 years ago, during the reign of the Northern Sung Dynasty.

The Jews of Kaifeng – a city on the banks of the Yellow River along the fabled Silk Road – established a community and built a synagogue in 1163. They lived close to the shul.

Kaifeng was a prosperous city when it was settled by Jews.

The explorer Marco Polo, in a diary entry in 1286, described a meeting he had with these exotic Jews.

In 1605, an Italian Jesuit missionary, Matteo Ricci, met Ai Tian, a representative of the Jewish community who had gone to Beijing to take a civil service examination.

After Ricci's encounter with Tian, a number of Jesuits visited Kaifeng, which is 600 kilometres southwest of Beijing.

They noted that the shul and the Jewish cemetery faced west toward Jerusalem, that the laws of kashrut were observed and that ritual circumcision was practised.

As time passed, this isolated community dwindled and was completely assimilated. The last rabbi died in 1810. The synagogue fell into ruin in 1854.

By 1860, the Jewish community had, for all intents and purposes, vanished.

Although Shi's ancestors virtually lost touch with Jewish customs and rituals, they remembered just enough to keep the flame flickering, passing on the knowledge from one generation to the next.

Shi's great-grandfather, Shi Qingchang, a businessman, observed rudiments of Passover, insisting on eating pancakes made without yeast.

Shi's grandfather, Shi Zhongyu, a white-collar worker, cooked unleavened cakes during Passover.

His father, an engineer, kept up what he describes as "traces of Jewish practices."

As Shi recalls, his father and grandfather told him he was "a Jewish descendant."

He has no doubt whatsoever that he is of Jewish origin. As he put it, "Over 25 years ago, the blood of Kaifeng's Jewish descendants was tested by doctors in a local population survey. They found that our blood type is similar to that of Jews living in Armenia and Arab countries."

Shi claims he is the only Jewish Chinese tour guide in China today, showing tourists sights in Kaifeng, Beijing, Shanghai, Harbin and other cities.

By his estimate, Kaifeng today is inhabited by 500 descendants of Chinese Jews.

Apart from a communal hall, known as Star of David, they have no facilities. "Due to our financial situation, we are unable to build them," he said.

Out of respect for their ancestors, every person of Jewish descent in Kaifeng refrains from eating pork. And sometimes, they meet on Friday evening for Shabbat. No kosher food is available in Kaifeng, he noted.

Shi says he always had a "strong desire" to study Judaism.

He got his chance a decade ago, when he met Marvin Tokayer, an American rabbi who led a congregation in Japan and who has taken a deep interest in Asian Jews.

"Rabbi Tokayer arranged for me to study at Bar-Ilan University's one-year Jewish studies program. I was the first Jewish descendant from Kaifeng to study Judaism in Israel. In Israel, I observed all the customs, rituals and holidays, attended shul and kept kosher."

'Linkage' argument stretches bounds of credulity

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

The "linkage" argument won't go away. If anything, it only seems to grow stronger.

The term refers to various efforts to link Israel to a range of Middle East and other problems by arguing that resolving the Israeli-Palestinian conflict is the key to resolving the region's myriad troubles, including the growth of Islamic extremism.

On April 24, the Montreal Gazette carried a Reuters report by William Maclean to this effect, under the headline "Mideast solution would hurt Al Qaeda." Maclean wrote that according to "western counter-terrorism analysts" the persistence of the Israeli-Palestinian dispute is fuelling "militant radicalization" and "transnational extremism" and that a solution to the dispute would deprive Al Qaeda of a "treasured pillar of its propaganda" (even though it has other anti-western grievances to draw upon).

Maclean cited Thomas Hegghammer, described as "a specialist on violent Islamism" at Princeton and Harvard universities, who remarked: "It doesn't matter what bin Laden thinks about Palestine, or whether Al Qaeda will stop fighting. What matters is the role the Palestinian issue plays in mobilizing new recruits and in creating a pool of sympathizers who look the other way when jihadis fundraise and plot. Virtually everyone who has studied jihadi recruitment up close will say that Palestine is important in this regard. It is obviously not the only factor or grievance, but it is the single most recurrent issue evoked by individual recruits."

This attitude is so widely held that it has become an article of faith among such experts. It's certainly superficially appealing to many to believe that resolving the Israel-Palestinian conflict "would help drain the pool of potential militants" (as Maclean summed up the experts' judgment). But scratch beneath the surface a bit and you start to see how fallacious this reasoning is.

Contrary to what Hegghammer and others like him maintain, it matters a great deal what bin Laden and his followers "think about Palestine" for this reason: the last thing they want to see is a two-state solution with Israel living alongside a Palestinian state.

For them, nothing short of the destruction of the Jewish state and the emergence of a purely Islamic nation in the entire region would address their grievances. Moving to a two-state solution is the precise opposite of this, an affirmation of a western conspiracy against Islam, and thus a provocation for only more extremist violence. The same attitude prevails among the Iranian mullahs, Hamas, Islamic Jihad, Hezbollah and others.

What is astonishing is the naivete of western "experts" who project their own attitudes about what would constitute a just solution for Palestinian "grievances" onto those who capitalize on the Palestinian cause for their own propaganda aims instead of paying attention to what these extremist movements actually stand for.

There isn't just one linkage argument but several, although they all involve placing Israel at the centre of the region's ills or near the centre, where the interests of foreign powers such as the United States, with its deep involvement in the Mideast, are concerned.

It's instructive to read David Aaron Miller's essay, "The False Religion of Mideast Peace," in the May/June issue of Foreign Policy magazine for, among other reasons, his sobering reassessment of a version of the linkage argument. As a former senior adviser on the Middle East in the U.S. State Department, he wrote memos in support of linkage. Yet, as he now admits, "Today, I couldn't write those same memos or anything like them with a clear conscience or a straight face."

Miller explains: "The notion that there's a single or simple fix to protecting [U.S.] interests, let alone that Arab-Israeli peace would, like some magic potion, bullet, or elixir, make it all better, is just flat wrong. In a broken, angry region with so many problems – from stagnant, inequitable economies to extractive and authoritarian governments that abuse human rights and deny rule of law, to a popular culture mired in conspiracy and denial – it stretches the bounds of credulity to the breaking point to argue that settling the Arab-Israeli conflict is the most critical issue, or that its resolution would somehow guarantee Middle East stability."

Unfortunately, for far too many others, stretching the bounds of credulity to the breaking point is of no concern when it comes to pushing a dangerously impoverished idea.

Koffler exhibit focuses on items, sounds

"We also don't know much about [Corbeil-Coleman's] character, so there is a bit of existential verity to this in a way that offers space for the viewer to mentally inhabit the scene, or to reach back into their own memories or daydreams."

Sound is a large part of the exhibit, as Woodley has expertly spliced the sounds of Berlin radio broadcasts, including Alfred Doeblin's popular The Story of Franz Biberkopf, with the cacophony of a neighbour practising Schubert and Beethoven.

"There has been a real focus on items and sounds and what they convey," says Woodley of his orchestration, which involved working with set and light designers, a pianist and a sound engineer. "These elements sometimes disrupt the calm of the living room and act as a counterpoint to the space of the synagogue itself."

Commissioned by Koffler curator Mona Filip, the installation arose from Woodley's own experiences in Berlin and Vilnius, Lithuania. "I always saw my family as a continuation of European Jewry [in North America] but being there, I felt the absence of a connection," he says. He recalls that in Vilnius, where there were once more than 100 synagogues, only one remains as evidence of the entire once-flourishing community.

"This setting asks people to address their notion of history – what's past and what's present and what's sacred," says Koffler executive director Lori Starr.

Tucked into a corner of the synagogue's sanctuary, the installation at once addresses mortality, memory and the ephemeral. "There is a sense of memorial to the exhibit, but there is also a living actor who infuses the setting with a sense of living, and a sense of reappearance," says Woodley. "What's different with this piece is that memory is always there – this experience is only here for five weeks. It's the sense of fleeting here-and-then-gone that will stay with the viewer."

On the road since last summer, the Koffler Centre's exhibits have been quite fleeting themselves, popping up across the city for the past year. "By taking our exhibits city-wide, we aim to address the diversity of Toronto and of Canada, but through our Jewish lens," says Starr.

"I want the viewer to approach the piece on their own terms," says Woodley. "Shul is a theatre of remembrance, and we are doing something of the same thing here by invoking an individual and cultural past that has returned in physical proximity to the present.

"My ideal viewer is a solitary person who brings a book and stays awhile on the benches of the shul, paying great attention at times, and at other times letting attention drift."

"Auguststrasse 25" runs until May 30 at the Kiever Synagogue, 25 Bellevue Ave. The free exhibition is open Sunday to Thursday from noon to 3 p.m. and 4 to 7 p.m. The exhibit is closed May 19 and 20 for Shavuot.

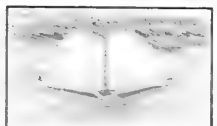
The 'sliding scale' of religious observance

By RABBI MATTHEW KAUFMAN

Secularism versus religion. This is the story of modernity. This, the story goes, is our inheritance from the Enlightenment, the era that allegedly ushered in philosophical rationalism and rejected traditional faith. But is this what happened?



Rabbinic Reflections

One problem with this story is that it encourages people to draw lines in the sand, separating us into categorical camps that ignore the reality of the fluid discourse continually taking place between secularism and religion. Another problem is that we have a tendency to view the different movements in Judaism on a kind of "sliding scale" of religious observance, from less to more.

As Stephen Sharot of Ben-Gurion University writes in Judaism and the Secularization Debate (Sociological Analysis, 1991, "such an equation makes orthopraxy synonymous with sacredness and thereby religiously devalues forms of modern Judaism, such as Conservative and Reform Judaism." If this is how we continue to see things, then the possibility of real mutual respect is just about nil.

But this assumption – that our post-Enlightenment inheritance has hopelessly divided us – is flawed. In recent years, scholars have begun to question the thesis that the Enlightenment is the story of the secularization of the West. Jonathan Sheehan, in Enlightenment, Religion, and the Enigma of Secularization (American Historical Review, 2003), writes that religion was always a cornerstone of the Enlightenment. Secularization and religion were never truly separate categories operating independently from one another, but are rather processes that inform one another.

"For religion has never been left behind, either personally or institutionally," Sheehan writes. "Instead, it has been continually remade and given new forms and meanings over time. Thinking more carefully about religion is a fundamental step in understanding both the Enlightenment and the enigmas of secularization."

The Enlightenment, he argues, was not a philosophical and anti-religious movement, but a set of cultural institutions and practices with a complex relationship to religion. Modernity, in other words, is not so much the birthplace of a thing called secularism that is the enemy of religion, but rather it is the birthplace of a process in which secular ideas and strategies have influenced religion, and vice versa; it's a discourse that continues to shape the distinctly modern Judaisms that we recognize today.

Jewish denominational practice should be understood as unique institutional responses to the post-Enlightenment discourse of secularism and religion. This view gives us the basis for true mutual respect, thereby opening us up to try to find common ground within the religious discourse.

This common ground is the realm of ethical behaviour. Jews live with a shared understanding of our mutual obligation to care for one another. The social, legal and religious frameworks of our lives all express this basic assumption.

This week's Torah reading, Behar-Bechukotai, contains one of the most important examples of this – the mitzvah of tzedakah. Behar's four-fold repetition of the words "v'chi yamuch achicha…" ("and if your fellow should be reduced to poverty…") inspired discussion among Jewish commentators to develop the principle of our obligation to care for the poor, which continues to be the most widely observed mitzvah, regardless of where one lies on the spectrum from secular to religious.

This ethical common ground thus corrects the "sliding scale" view of denominational Judaism. We should instead see the plurality of Jewish life as an invitation to better understand our own continually developing response to the post-Enlightenment secular-religious dialectic.

Rabbi Matthew Kaufman is studying toward a PhD in humanities at York University.

A celebration of numbers

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

With Rosh Chodesh Sivan just around the corner, the holiday of Shavuot can't be far behind. Shavuot, the holiday of weeks, is the culmination of counting seven weeks from near the beginning of Pesach and leading up to the harvest and the giving of the Torah to the Jewish people. It's a foundational holiday in Jewish history, one of the three pilgrimage festivals that united all of ancient Israel within the land – ritually, nationally and economically.

Midrashic Moments

Shavuot represents receiving the gift of Torah and the beginning of the Jewish transition toward text and discourse. It's a time for celebration, study, all-night text sharing and spiritual Torah insights that usually occur best around 3 a.m.

It's of no minor significance that the holiday itself is named for a number unit – seven. Shavuot means "weeks," a collection of seven days. In fact, since Pesach, Jews have counted the Omer by week and day, culminating in the holiday of Shavuot. Admitting that this is not even subtle, it's appropriate to turn our attention to numbers as the month of Sivan begins and we prepare for Shavuot.

Sivan itself connects to a world event that overwhelms us with numbers. Noah's Ark came to rest in the month of Sivan and the flood began to recede. The repetitive aspect of the story of Noah's Ark is how many numbers appear within the text: the cubit measures, Noah's three sons, the pairs of animals, the various different numbers of pairs of animals, the day the rain started, how many days it rained, how many days it didn't rain, how many days until birds flew, etc.

Clearly, Sivan invites us to embrace numbers. Yet moving from Pesach to Shavuot, from slavery to revelation, the narrative plays with the specific number 3 time and again. Moses is the third child born in his family. He's hidden at home for three months, at which point his mother and his sister place him in an ark (reminiscent of Noah, who had three sons), where Pharaoh's daughter saves him. Three women at the water save the third child who is three months old.

As Israel camps at Mount Sinai and prepares to receive the Torah, Moses instructs them to spend three days in preparation for Divine Revelation. Although the experience itself is so potentially overwhelming that, according to many midrashim, it's life threatening, all of Israel is kept safe, since according to the Talmud, after all, we all have three parents: mother, father and God.

Eventually we will learn that the angels serenade God by singing the word "Holy" three times. We will imitate them and sing "Kadosh" three times. The Rabbis will construct our daily prayers around regular communication with God – three times every day.

Within Jewish law, a person is ritually empowering themselves toward obligation by consistently performing a mitzvah three times. It's the number that represents spiritual strength and commitment.

The Torah has three sections (Torah, Prophets, Scrolls), which fits perfectly with a people of three categories (Kohen, Levi, Israel).

It's no wonder that an ancient sage noted with regard to Shavuot: "Blessed is He who is everywhere, who gave a three-part Torah to a three-part nation by the third [child], on the third day in the third month."

The holiday of weeks celebrates our receiving the Torah and reminds us that the wisdom of Torah fills our world. Our math teachers were correct: there does come a day when everything boils down to numbers.

The Temple: part 1

By ALEX GROPPER

Past Forward

The Temple in Jerusalem, Solomon's Temple, Herod's Temple, the Ark of the Covenant – these are names that just about everyone is familiar with.

Why do they resonate so profoundly through the psyche of our culture and civilization? All of the world's three great monotheistic faiths incorporate the Temple into their history and ritual. For Judaism, Christianity and Islam, it plays a crucial role whether in their beginnings, their rituals or their aspirations.

It was Judaism that gave birth to the Temple, just as it gave birth to the other two monotheistic faiths. Yet the concept of the Temple stretches back in time before Judaism, before even the birth of civilization itself. There are sanctuaries in the earliest villages, from the time man was making the crucial transition from food gathering to food producing. In fact, we can take the concept of a sacred spot at least as far back as the caves that have been discovered in southern France and northern Spain, places such as Lascaux and Altamira that date to between 15,000 and 20,000 years ago.

What was there about these dark, mysterious and dangerous grottoes that drew people into their inner recesses? Some have said that the caves are connected to the fertility rites of the Mother Goddess cults that were prevalent in prehistoric societies. The cave has been likened to the primordial womb from which all life sprang. By visiting it periodically, early man assured himself and his endeavours a bountiful harvest.

It's no accident that when cities began to emerge in Mesopotamia, around the fourth millennium BCE, the temple and its sanctuary lay at the heart of the new urban enclaves. Cities had sprung up in answer to the immemorial quest for sustenance and security. Yet despite their new setting, humankind had not forgotten its origins.

The Mesopotamian urban model spread across the Fertile Crescent, arching its way up the Tigris-Euphrates basin westward through Syria and down along the lands that bordered the eastern end of the Mediterranean, Homer's wine-dark sea.

The temple was no stranger to one of those lands at the eastern end of the great inland sea, lands that were crisscrossed by innumerable hills and valleys, each with its small urban centre and petty ruler. We now know the land that was called Canaan by the ancients as Israel.

At the dawn of history, around 3000 BCE, one of the most important cities in Canaan lay astride the route, connecting the land to the great river civilizations of Mesopotamia and Egypt. The city's name was Megiddo, and its location was so crucial that innumerable battles were fought to control it. In English, we call the city Armageddon. The book of Revelation in the Christian New Testament tells us that it will be the site of the final apocalyptical battle at the end of history itself.

Megiddo possessed one of the earliest temples in the land of the Bible. It's a temple that has been hailed as the prototype of Solomon's Temple. Despite Canaan's proximity to Egypt, with its imposing monumental places of worship, and its failed attempt at a form of monotheism under the heretic Pharaoh Akhenaten, the predecessor of Tutankhamun, in the 14th century BCE, it was the Mesopotamian and Syrian model of temple architecture that would dominate ancient Israel. This model would culminate in Solomon's Temple.

Why has this temple above all others dominated the psyche of the world? Obviously, it is the focal point of Judaism and through Judaism its importance was passed on to Christianity and Islam. It was David who conquered Jerusalem and the site of the Temple from the Jebusites and brought the visible manifestation of Israelite religion, the Ark of Covenant, into the city. But it would be David's son, Solomon, who would build the Temple that bears his name.

Yiddishe mamas: classic and contemporary

My Yiddishe mama – I miss her more than ever now
My Yiddishe mama – I long to kiss her wrinkled brow
I long to hold her hand once more as in days gone by
And ask her to forgive me for things I did that made her cry.

– My Yiddishe Mama (1925), Ben Pollack and Jack Yellen [bit.ly/mama15]

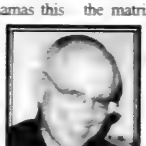
A lot of people will be thinking of and thanking their Yiddishe mamas this Sunday. Although Mother's Day and its greeting-card-and-flowers juggernaut are not a Jewish creation, now is as good a time as ever to remember and celebrate our Jewish mothers.



Jewish & Digital
By Mark Mietkiewicz

The National Jewish Center for Learning and Leadership points out "we've been honouring our mothers (and fathers) since Mount Sinai" and Jewish tradition is filled with reverence for mothers all the way from the story of the matriarchs to King Solomon's Proverbs: "My child… do not walk away from the wisdom of your mother, for it will be a sign of grace upon your head." (Proverbs 1:8-9) [bit.ly/mama2]

"Mother's Day is not a Jewish holiday; it's a brilliantly contrived marketing tool. But try telling that to my mother." Liba Pearson says a day for mothers really isn't such a bad idea "but every day should really be Mother's Day… I still think that Mother's Day was created by Hallmark. But you know what? Mothers – mine first among them – deserve it, and how." [bit.ly/mama3]

When people claim that Mother's Day is not a Jewish holiday, they aren't completely correct. A sort of Mother's Day is observed in Israel (especially among preschoolers) on the 11th day of Cheshvan. That's the traditional date of the death of the matriarch Rachel. Eliezer Segal investigates how Rachel embodies the Jewish ideal of motherhood – who "for much of her married life had to resign herself to watching her sister, Leah, bear Jacob many children, until she herself finally gave birth to Joseph." [bit.ly/mama4]

Inda Schaenen wants to be a Yiddishe mama. The problem is that she had no role model since she grew up with a Jewish mother not a "mama." ("Her body was Jean Naté and hair dye, razors and eyebrow tweezers. Our kitchen did not reek of the yeasty, buttery, beefy fumes of daily cookery. It smelled clean."). So Inda turned to The Molly Goldberg Jewish Cookbook, "[which] became a kind of lodestone for me: if I cooked with enough butter, salt, sour cream and chicken fat, I could land myself and my family in the warm, loving, safe world of Molly Goldberg." Unfortunately, Schaenen had a bit of falling out with her newfound mama. But you'll have to check out her article at Salon.com to find out what happened. [bit.ly/mama7]

If you want to read about the lives of some real Jewish mothers who brought up some famous boys and girls, read the interviews with Beatty Rutman (Bob Dylan), Florence Hoffman (Abbie Hoffman), Leah Adler (Steven Spielberg) as part of the book the "Official Jewish Mothers' Hall of Fame." [bit.ly/mama16] Or you can find a list of dozens of books that focus on, or feature, Jewish mothers in fact and fiction. [bit.ly/mama10]

Canadian soldier helped liberate Netherlands

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

When Germany invaded the Netherlands on May 10, 1940, Larry Levy was a high school student at Central Tech in Toronto.

He could not have known then that he would play a role in the liberation of the Netherlands just five years later, on May 5, 1945.

Now 85, Levy was an artillery signaller in the 2nd Survey Regiment, one of 200,000 Canadian troops who helped to liberate the Netherlands in a bold offensive that left the Dutch people eternally grateful to Canada. "I was part of that force," recalled Levy in a reference to the First Canadian Army. "It was a terrific moment, a wonderful moment."

Levy enlisted in the Canadian Armed Forces in January 1943 and was sent into the Netherlands in November 1944, spending part of the next five months there.

By the time he was demobilized in 1946, he had also seen action in France, Belgium and Germany.

And if Japan had not surrendered in 1945, he probably would have fought in the Japanese islands as well.

Levy, given his current health problems, does not expect to be in the Netherlands this week to mark the 65th anniversary of its liberation from the Nazi yoke.

But a decade ago, he and his wife, Betty, flew there to celebrate the 55th anniversary. As guests of a Dutch family, they were treated with the utmost hospitality and respect.

As he and 2,500 Canadian veterans marched through the town of Apeldoorn in a tumultuous victory parade, they were cheered on by Dutch onlookers. "Hundreds of thousands of people watched. Kids were grabbing and kissing us. The people of Holland were great. They so admire Canadians."

On the day the Netherlands was liberated 65 years ago, Levy was in a halftrack military vehicle clanking and clattering down a road somewhere in the country. "I had heard there was a ceasefire," he said.

In fact, German troops had already laid down their arms, two days ahead of their capitulation in the rest of Europe.

Levy was fortunate enough to emerge from World War II virtually unscathed.

While more than 7,600 Canadian soldiers lost their lives to liberate the Netherlands, including 25 of his friends and acquaintances, Levy was twice wounded, first when he cut his left arm on barbed wire and contracted blood poisoning and then when he twisted his nose in a foxhole during a fierce German bombardment.

Even now, he feels lucky he returned to Canada in one piece. As he put it in a recent interview at his home in northern Toronto, "There were many times when I doubted I'd come out of it alive."

The son of Nathan and Annie, Russian immigrants who settled in Toronto in the first decade of the 1900s, Levy was employed as an assembler in a radio manufacturing plant when he volunteered for the Canadian Army. He was spurred on by the deaths of some of his friends in the disastrous Dieppe raid in August 1942.

By that point, he was already in the reserves. "I was a kid of 17 or 18, doing a little bit of training," he recalled.

His brother, Irving, a graduate of the University of Toronto's medical school, joined the army too and served in Italy.

Trained for battle in Ottawa, Petawawa and Kingston, Levy left Canada from Halifax on a troop ship bound for Liverpool, Britain.

As an artillery signaller assigned to a five-man crew usually deployed in trenches on the front lines, Levy's job was to spot enemy gun positions, tanks and artillery fire.

Once they located a target, they radioed the information to headquarters.

Larry Levy as a young Canadian soldier

'It was quite an experience'

After artillery guns softened up the target and the air force responded with bombing runs, the infantry advanced.

Levy's 2nd Survey Regiment landed at Beny Sur Mer, on the coast of Normandy, in the summer of 1944. During the hazardous landing, his unit was bombarded by German artillery and Messerschmitt aircraft, resulting in its first casualties. A while later, he discovered that 124 captured Canadians were executed by the Germans under the command of an SS officer.

Despite these atrocities, Levy has respect for the German troops he faced on the front. "They were excellent soldiers, strong and determined, ready to kill."

In the Netherlands, Levy spent much of the time in the Nijmegen salient, which had been captured by British and American forces and was close to the German frontier. "We set up a position in a school, but it was bombed by the Germans." Levy was dug out of the rubble, miraculously uninjured.

From Nijmegen, Levy's regiment was dispatched to Germany, crossing the Rhine River on pontoon bridges at Emmerich and deployed in a series of towns from Cleve to Calcap.

The roads were virtually impassable, the Germans having flooded the area. Nonetheless, Levy's unit pushed on to Oldenberg – where he had his first shower in months – and the port of Emden.

As the war ended, he found himself back in the Netherlands. But it was not until 10 years ago that he finally managed to visit Amsterdam.

Levy joined the Canadian Far East Force before returning to Canada. But after atomic bombs were dropped on the cities of Nagasaki and Hiroshima, Japan surrendered and Levy's services were no longer required.

Discharged in February 1946, he was a taxi driver before buying his own fleet of cabs and branching off into real estate development. Although he is not in the best of health, he still works as a broker. He and his wife have three children, all girls.

A feisty man who keeps his war memorabilia – five Canadian service medals and a black German bayonette – in his bedroom, Levy looks back at his days as a soldier with a sense of awe and disbelief.

"I can hardly believe I went through it all," he said. "It was quite an experience, an unbelievable one."

SHOVE

yourself, your friends, your spouse/significant other or whomever in the you-know-where and get over to the Miles Nadal JCC for a mystical night of learning. For those of you who don't know, Shavuot (Shove-ooh-ot) is the celebration of the Jews receiving the Ten Commandments. You know why we got them? God offered them to a dishonest person, who asked what was involved, and when they found out they could not steal, they turned God down. God then offered them to a philanderer who asked what was involved, and when they found out they could not cheat, they turned God down too. God then offered them to a workaholic who asked what was involved, and when they found out they could not work on the Sabbath, they turned God down as well. Wanna know what happened next?

-OOH

ooh, ahh, I knew you'd be curious. So here's what happened. Finally, God offered the Ten Commandments to a Jew, who asked how much they'd cost. When God said "nothing" the Jew said, "They cost nothing? Great, I'll take Ten." Aha, so now you know the whole story. Here's a slightly more traditional explanation. Exactly seven weeks after we Jews left Egypt we arrived at Mt. Sinai (you know, on University below College) and were given the Torah, we then became a nation committed to serving God. Shavuot is a Hebrew derivative of "weeks" since we're counting them. We traditionally eat good cheesecake.

-OT

Over Time. That's what happens on Shavuot. It goes from 9 pm to 6 am. Really. We spend a fabulous night with new, interesting people taking classes every hour: meditation, storytelling, Torah study, cooking, music philosophy, Talmud, and more. So OTher than sitting around like a loser all alone with nothing to do May 18th, give yourself a SHOVE in your spiritual behind, we guarantee you'll ooh and ahh at all you'll discover.

York psychology prof receives Killam Prize

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

"Extraordinary" is how York University psychology professor Ellen Bialystok describes winning the prestigious Killam Prize for her work on the effects of bilingualism on cognitive development.

Renowned internationally for research, Bialystok, who has taught at York since 1982, "discovered that bilingual children and adults have distinct advantages over unilingual people when completing both linguistic and nonlinguistic tasks," according to a York statement on her win, which is given for a scholar's body of work and worth $100,000.

Perhaps more importantly, her research is also revealing that as bilingual and multilingual people age, their language skills may help provide a buffer against diseases such as dementia and Alzheimer's.

Speaking to The CJN after her win, Bialystok said winning the Killam is "extraordinary," as recipients are determined after their body of work is evaluated by their peers.

"It's an incredible recognition. In academia you're only as good as your last paper. So you can put out a flashy finding and then no one remembers you. This [award] is quite outside of that model," she said.

The prize, administered by the Canada Council for the Arts (CCA), is given out annually to five Canadian scholars "for their distinction in health sciences, engineering, humanities, natural sciences and social sciences," according the CCA's website. Bialystok won in the social sciences category.

The prestigious award could help her work become more accepted in mainstream science. This has not been the case for many years, she said.

Her work "has always been perceived as a kind of 'non-mainstream' sideline, as far as the larger field of cognitive psychology was concerned," Bialystok said. "One thing this award does is acknowledge that [bilingualism] is actually part of the mainstream questions we need to understand when we investigate the mind."

Ellen Bialystok

Bialystok said one of her most "exciting" finds of the past few years came from a study conducted at Baycrest, where she compared monolingual and bilingual patients with dementia or Alzheimer's.

"There was a sense that if bilingualism is doing something to support cognitive functioning in healthy aging, then what would it be doing if the aging process included some pathology" such as Alzheimer's, she said.

The study of 200 patients produced an interesting finding among the bilingual half of the sample.

"Patients wait about three years between noticing a problem and their first clinic visit. The difference is that bilinguals were on average four years older when they, or at least their families, first noticed symptoms," she said. "This means that they are coping better with the growing pathology and appearing to function normally, even though the disease has already started. We now have some new brain data showing that the disease is more advanced in bilinguals who are functioning at the same cognitive level as monolinguals."

In other words, bilingualism provided a four-year buffer – or "cognitive reserve" – for patients before the effects of dementia or Alzheimer's forced them to first seek out treatment or diagnosis.

Bialystok, who lectures worldwide on her research, said that during her travels, she's noticed, not unsurprisingly, that people in regions that are more multilingual tend to show more interest in her work.

She noted that in Spain and Wales, there currently is "very active research" on the effects of bilingualism.

Bialystok said the emphasis on bilingualism in Canada helps make her research tasks here easier.

Asked what she is working on now, Bialystok said some of her research is beginning to focus more on neural imaging to look at actual brain function.

"We're much more interested in getting information about brain networks now. My idea is that using two languages over a sustained period of time re-wires cognitive networks. All of higher cognition depends on these networks. That's increasingly the position that the field is coming to," she said.

A new group being researched now are people who have "intense" musical training. Bialystok wants to compare their cognitive networks to those of bilingual people, although this is proving difficult.

"We're trying to find monolingual musicians. But this isn't easy, because the people who send their kids for intensive musical training from an early age are [generally] not monolingual English speakers."

THE LEO BAECK DAY SCHOOL
announces the appointment of YVETTE BURKE
as North Campus Principal, effective July 1, 2010

The Leo Baeck Day School is pleased to announce the appointment of Yvette Burke as North Campus Principal, succeeding Howard Laderman. The North Campus Principal is the senior administrator responsible for all educational/academic site operations. Ms. Burke will assume her duties July 1, 2010.

Ms. Burke has been in charge of Student Services at Leo Baeck for 24 years, supporting the learning and socialization of all students. Her selection is the result of significant and thoughtful deliberation on the part of the school's Parental and Faculty Advisory Committees.

In her current position as Dean of Student Services, Ms. Burke has played a fundamental role in the development of the school's educational program, particularly our key mission objective of providing a child-centred learning environment. As a member of the senior administrative team, she has been engaged in all aspects of Leo Baeck's candidacy for the International Baccalaureate designation, including training and implementation. Ms. Burke has also worked closely with Howard Laderman in his tenure as Principal, and plans to champion the positive initiatives Mr. Laderman began, most notably his significant commitment to innovative teaching practices in the area of early literacy.

Ms. Burke's commitment to the Leo Baeck community, together with her excellence as an educator, will serve the North Campus well. We would like to congratulate her on, and welcome her into, her new role.

New MEC rules make boycotts harder

By LAUREN KRAMER
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — It's unlikely Mountain Equipment Co-op (MEC) will see another resolution aimed at eliminating its business relationships in Israel, thanks to a series of five special resolutions tabled by the co-op's board of directors and unanimously passed in recent MEC elections that ran between February and April.

The resolutions were a response to events last May, when a few MEC members tried to convince the company to stop sourcing products made in Israel. Their motion was defeated by majority vote at MEC's annual general meeting. Seventy per cent of the 256 members who attended the AGM voted against the resolution.

Among the five resolutions passed this year, the first and third prevent single-issue political activists from using the co-op's constitution to bring forward motions to be considered by the membership at an AGM.

The first resolution requires a 60-day written notice of an ordinary resolution prior to the AGM, which means members can no longer simply stand up at the meeting and propose an ordinary resolution. The third resolution empowers the board to disallow ordinary resolutions that MECs directors deem to be against the co-op's best interests.

"Before this rule came into effect, any ordinary resolution proposed would have to be heard," said MEC spokesperson Tim Southam. "That's why last year, when we were called on to stop sourcing from Israel, that resolution had to come forward. This special resolution means that the board could decide, were this to happen again, to disallow it."

The third resolution wasn't proposed specifically in response to last year's boycott, although it did play a role in its proposal.

"In the past we've had resolutions composed by competitors of the co-op who also happened to be MEC members calling on MEC to change its business practices in untoward ways," Southam said. "Last year, the board recognized they needed to address this shortcoming in our rules to enable them to assess ordinary resolutions."

More than 30,000 votes were cast in the election on the special resolutions, and the first and third resolutions, which required 75 per cent approval from voting members, passed by 91 per cent and 89 per cent, respectively.

"That's an endorsement of the board's governance, and it shows that members view our board as being very responsible, trustworthy and of representing their interests," Southam said.

Michael Elterman, chair of the Canada-Israel Committee, Pacific region, commended MEC members on taking "a step in the right direction towards preserving MEC the way it should be – a co-operative that unites its members and puts politics aside. These measures will prevent groups that seek to misuse MEC's organizational structure to make controversial and divisive political statements from doing so."

Galloway case still under review

Compiled by CJN Staff

Lawyers for banned British MP George Galloway argued in Federal Court last week that he was unjustly barred from Canada because the federal government has a "pro-Israel" bias.

Galloway has taken Citizenship and Immigration Minister Jason Kenney to court in an attempt to overturn the ban.

Last March, Galloway was refused entry into Canada by the Canadian Border Services Agency for allegedly financing terrorism via his charity, Viva Palestina. On its website, the charity's stated purpose is to provide "food, medicine and essential goods and services" to Gazans.

Galloway has also given money to Hamas, which Canada lists as a terrorist organization. As a result, the government views Galloway himself as a member of a terrorist organization. Late last week, the Toronto Star reported that Galloway's lawyers told a Federal Court hearing in Toronto that the government "has no right to enforce… views on us as Canadians who want to hear George Galloway speak."

Pro- and anti-Galloway protesters sparred verbally outside the court building last week, with those defending the British MP calling for the defence of free speech, while members of the Jewish Defense League chanting support for the government's stance that he provides a "material support" for terror groups.

At The CJN's deadline, the court was still reviewing the ban.

Kingston shul celebrates 100th birthday

By JORDAN PRESS
Special to The CJN

KINGSTON, Ont. — Beth Israel Congregation's main sanctuary can be humbling when it is flooded with light from the domed skylight overhead, but for those who pray here, there is always the feeling that it is home.

From May 14 to 16, Beth Israel will hold a homecoming to celebrate its 100th anniversary. The celebration is more than a milestone – it's also a testament to the life of a Jewish community in a small city, a community that remains vibrant despite the fact that its members are slowly declining, a fact that also raises questions about the future of Kingston's Jewish community.

"How will [the community] be 100 years from now?" ponders Marion Meyer, a retired Queen's University sociology professor who has researched Kingston's Jewish community. "It's a very interesting question I've asked myself."

The central question as the nearly 170-year-old community has evolved is about religious affiliation. Beth Israel is modern Orthodox, but that could change.

"At some point, it's going to have to happen," says Mayor Harvey Rosen, a former Beth Israel president and lifelong Kingstonian. "There are some serious challenges with the secularization of the Jewish community."

In Beth Israel's early years, Jews were deeply involved in congregational life. Today, they are more integrated into the community and serve in a number of philanthropic and public positions.

In 1842, brothers Abraham and Samuel Nordheimer became the first known Jews in Kingston, but they moved to Toronto in 1844. The first Jews to settle here were Celina and Simon Oberndorffer, who came in 1857 and were instrumental in founding the first congregation in 1908.

Beth Israel Congregation

On Oct. 10, 1910, the community laid the cornerstone for the first Beth Israel building. The local Jewish community paid for most of the building, but the wider community chipped in 20 per cent of the cost. In a sense, the evolution of Kingston's Jews into a community that now leads many philanthropic organizations can be seen as a means to give back to the city that helped provide Jews with a place of their own.

"It has been an incredibly active community," says Vivien Ludwin, one of the congregants who researched the synagogue's history through its archives. Ludwin says the archives provided examples of Jews involved in public life beginning with Celina and Simon Oberndorffer. Simon was an alderman, the first of several Kingston Jews to serve in public office.

Historically, Kingston's Jews were merchants from eastern Europe. Material from the synagogue's archives shows that board meeting minutes were recorded in Hebrew and Yiddish. Today, Jews still have a strong commercial presence in Kingston, but they are more diverse, including a number of South Africans.

For many years, the congregation was housed downtown on Queen Street, but today it's on Centre Street in one of Kingston's oldest residential areas, near the university and Lake Ontario. Community events, like Israel Independence Day, attract large crowds to Beth Israel.

Coast to Coast

Celebrations planned for May 14-16

The synagogue started out as a place of worship, but has become the de facto Jewish community centre, Meyer says.

The lifeblood of the community partially flows through Queen's. Each year, Jewish students take part in synagogue life at Beth Israel or through the Hillel events held at Hillel House next door to the synagogue. The university has also attracted a number of Jewish intellectuals who hold positions at the university, including the principal, Daniel Woolf.

While Queen's has been a saving grace for the community, a few core families who have been in the city for generations – whom Meyer describes as the "dynastic families" – also help maintain Jewish life in the city.

The number of Beth Israel members has stayed relatively steady over the years. A study Meyer conducted for the 100th anniversary found that in 2009, Beth Israel's membership numbered 142 households. In 1976, there were 143.

Between 1976 and 2009, the religious makeup of the Jewish community in Kingston changed, according to Meyer's research. In 1976, the majority of Beth Israel members considered themselves Conservative or Orthodox. A 2009 survey of members under the age of 60 showed only two Orthodox families. Rosen and others believe a change of religious affiliation is coming in the next few years.

Of the approximately 1,100 Jews living in Kingston, only half are affiliated with Beth Israel or Iyr HaMelech, Kingston's Reform congregation. Both congregations are looking for a way to reach out to the others and feel the pressure to come up with an answer soon.

For now, though, the Jewish community is thriving – something that can't be said of other small communities, Meyer says.

And it is also focused on the celebrations at hand, which include:

- the presentation and sale of a commemorative DVD, highlighting the shul's history through its archives;
- Friday and Shabbat morning services, the latter being dedicated to Beth Israel's 18 presidents;
- a Saturday "Deli Schmoozefest" for up to 400 expected guests;
- a Sunday concert titled "100 Years of Jewish Music" at Grant Hall on the Queen's University campus.

"The synagogue is undergoing a massive spring cleaning, and a palpable enthusiasm is bubbling through the congregation," says Gini Rosen, co-chair of the 100th anniversary celebrations. "There is a sense of satisfaction as well as the gift of revelation. Hidden benefits emerge from every undertaking – particularly a sense of having done something meaningful together."

Survey aims to help people with disabilities

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Lorna Rosenstein and Deborah Cohen are trying to make a difference for people with disabilities.

They are conducting a customer service survey, in which they are gathering ideas, suggestions and concerns to be compiled into a report that will be used to inform businesses, organizations and the government on how to improve accessibility to their goods and services, and how to enhance customer service.

Rosenstein said she and Cohen, who both have vision problems, share the same philosophy. "We both feel that we can't make decisions for people unless we know what they need. We cannot speak for someone else. We decided to start with a survey… that asked broad questions about the major barriers to accessibility."

Their intent, she said, is to identify standards with which organizations and businesses will have to comply.

The questions are intentionally general, Cohen said, so that people won't identify with specific issues. "For example, people with different disabilities responded that they have problems with dim lighting. Those who are hearing impaired need good lighting so they can see for sign language, and those with mobility and agility issues need good lighting so they can move freely. If we streamed barriers according to disabilities, we would miss a lot."

The two met when Rosenstein, who is visually impaired, joined the board of directors of Abilities Arts Festival, where Cohen was executive director. The organization promotes diversity, inclusiveness and the power of art as a means of enriching the cultural fabric of our communities.

"Lorna is a businessperson – she has 20 years executive and senior management experience in the high-tech industry – and we needed someone with business, and not not-for-profit experience."

They continued to meet after Cohen left the festival, and "we began talking about accessibility. The survey got going because Lorna thought it was important," Cohen said.

Rosenstein said that after she took early retirement, she wanted to volunteer on a board where she could make a difference. "When I met Deborah, it all fell into place."

Since the passing of the Accessibility for Ontarians with Disabilities Act (AODA) in 2005, she said, the government is developing mandatory accessibility standards designed to identify, remove and prevent barriers for people with disabilities in key areas of daily living.

Deborah Cohen

Lorna Rosenstein

"[We thought] it was vital to hear from those who actually experience barriers. It is critical to provide a voice to those most affected."

The survey, which is self-funded by their companies, Performance Solutions Network and LLR & Associates, "is an integral part of a project examining what Ontarians with diverse disabilities view as the most important issues and barriers to accessing everyday goods and services."

Cohen, whose vision problem means that she sees triple, says they have sent the survey out to community organizations, distributed it at events and led focus groups.

"We started simple and small, but we realized that that wouldn't accomplish what we wanted. People were responding to us with passion, so we decided we had to be thorough."

Not only will the survey make a difference to society, she said, it will also help businesses and organizations. "It's financially smart to be accessible to everyone."

Rosenstein said there would be a lot more places she would visit if there were not so many barriers.

"Our key is to open dialogue, and express concerns. Accessibility is much more than constructing a ramp. Barriers also include attitudes, information and policies. Even though a business is physically accessible, people still may not be able to use it."

The survey, which takes about 20 minutes to complete, is available online at www.psncorp.com.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Proximity talks to address final-status issues

© Ha'aretz Daily News Service

JERUSALEM – Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas on Monday said indirect peace talks scheduled to begin this week with Israel will address final-status issues, including borders, Palestinian refugees and Jerusalem, Army Radio reported.

"There is a historic opportunity before Israel, if it withdraws from all Palestinian and Arab lands," said Abbas adding that in exchange, under the Arab peace initiative, Israel would be officially recognized by Arab states.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu intends to open the indirect talks with the Palestinian Authority this week with a discussion of the security arrangements in the West Bank and of water resources.

A senior official told Ha'aretz that Netanyahu had recently asked the defence establishment and the National Security Council to elaborate on the so-called eight-points brief, which lists Israel's security demands in terms of a permanent status agreement, as framed by Ehud Olmert's government.

Also Monday, chief Palestinian negotiator Saeb Erekat told Army Radio that Israel should avoid taking any unilateral steps in east Jerusalem and the West Bank, adding that he felt Israel had no reason to sabotage upcoming talks.

Erekat also refuted recent reports stating there had been a falling out between Abbas and PA Prime Minister Salam Fayyad, saying that those reports were "rumors and illusions that Israel is spreading. Their relationship is very good."

Meannwhile Deputy Prime Minister Dan Meridor said in an interview with Army Radio that upcoming proximity talks were unlikely to succeed, adding that it was "clear to everyone that the real talks are direct, and as soon as we get to them the sooner we can get to the crux of the matter.

"Proximity talks are a peculiar thing. For 16 years, almost every government has talked to the Palestinians and suddenly they ask for this," Meridor said, adding he felt indirect talks were "a Palestinian attempt to push the Americans in."

Meridor also said it was "a mistake to think Israel didn't want to push things forward," adding that both sides "were losing from the present situation and need to advance to an agreement.

"These talks don't just represent an Israeli interest, even though we have a clear interest, but a Palestinian as well," Meridor said.

Earlier Monday, Army Radio reported that official documents showed Jerusalem's municipal planning committee would not be discussing any significant construction plans for Jewish housing in east Jerusalem in its upcoming meetings.

Jerusalem officials claimed the lack of discussion regarding east Jerusalem building was an attempt to appease U.S. President Barack Obama's administration in the wake of recent tensions between the allies.

Netanyahu met with Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak in Sharm el-Sheikh on Monday to discuss the upcoming negotiations.

U.S. special envoy to the Middle East, George Mitchell, was expected in Israel on Monday to launch the negotiations. Mitchell will spend the first phase of the proximity talks shuttling between Jerusalem and Ramallah.

Protesters menace Israeli diplomat in Britain

JTA

LONDON — Pro-Palestinian protesters tried to attack the deputy ambassador of Israel to Britain.

Protesters lunged at Talya Lador-Fresher following her lecture April 28 at the University of Manchester. The envoy, who was not hurt, told Britain's Jewish Chronicle that she feared she would be physically assaulted by the protesters.

Lador-Fresher was removed from the area by a security vehicle, which she entered from the back entrance of the lecture hall. The demonstrators attacked the car, some holding Palestinian flags up to the windows and others climbing on the hood and trying to smash the windshield, according to reports.

"I don't think they wanted to kill me, but I genuinely believed they wanted to physically hurt me," she said. "If I had not had the police and security team, I would have been beaten up."

Lador-Fresher told the Jewish Chronicle that "No foreign diplomat should have to go through what I went through."

She had been scheduled to give the lecture in February, but it was postponed following reports of planned demonstrations and the inability of university authorities to properly protect her. At that time, more than 300 protesters from the Action Palestine student society scuffled with Jewish students and police.

The lecture was scheduled for April 28, when police and university authorities said they were prepared to deal with the demonstrators, including a complete lockdown of the building, a high-level security presence, ID checks at the door and ticket-only arrangements.

Anti-Semitism discounted as cause of demolition in Morocco

JTA

TANGIER — The president of Morocco's Jewish community discounted rumors that the demolition of a Jewish-owned property in Tangier was related to anti-Semitism.

Over Passover, authorities in Tangier began carrying out a longstanding demolition order of a building that used to house the Jewish Benchimol Hospital in the city. The property still belongs to the Jewish community. The action prompted the president of the Federation of Jewish Communities in Spain, Jacobo Israel Garzon, to send a letter of protest to the governor of Tangier demanding that Jewish rights to the property be respected and restored.

The president of the Jewish Communities Council of Morocco, Serge Berdugo, who met with the governor of Tangier after Passover, confirmed that a November 2008 demolition order against the building was being carried out because the structure was unsafe and not for any other reason.

"The fact that the building was demolished over a Passover evening is a mere and unfortunate coincidence," he said. "The decision to demolish the Tangier-based Benchimol hospital was taken after studies showed that this facility, decommissioned and vacant since the mid-1960s, was beyond redemption and could not be revamped at reasonable costs for the Jewish community of Tangier. Although I can understand the feelings sparked by such a decision, the worries and rumours spread in this regard are baseless."

The president of Tangier's Jewish community, Abraham Azencot, was out of town when the razing began, leading to speculation about the reason and timing of the demolition, Berdugo said. Several other structures in the area also are being demolished, including a mosque and church, as well as private and public buildings, he said.

Berdugo said the Jewish community must decide whether to sell or rent the property parcel, or exchange it for another property.

"We have to discuss what is best for the Jewish community because we need money to preserve a Jewish cemetery and historical Jewish synagogues," Berdugo said.

Divestment bills defeated

JTA

BERKELEY, Calif. – The student government at the University of California, Berkeley fell a vote short in a bid to override a veto against a divestment bill.

Meanwhile, a vote early last Thursday morning by the Associated Students at the University of California, San Diego reportedly was unsuccessful in passing a similar measure.

At Berkeley, 13 senators voted early in the morning of April 29 to override the veto, with five voting to uphold it. Fourteen votes were necessary for the override.

The vote at about 4 a.m. followed a meeting that began in the evening attended by about 200 people, according to reports.

"We lost the vote, but won the night," read a statement on the CalDivest from Apartheid website. "We made a statement recorded for posterity and forced everyone to listen and watch what the nature of Israeli occupation is, to listen to Palestinian voices, from Palestine and from the US, telling their stories. These transcripts will stay preserved in recorded history, and we shall overcome."

A vote April 15 failed to overturn student government president Will Smelko's veto of the Associated Students' bill, which was adopted 16-4 in March. However, following several procedural votes, the bill was tabled, making it available again for reconsideration.

The bill would have required divestment of students' association assets from General Electric and United Technologies, two companies cited frequently by Israel's detractors for complicity in alleged war crimes and perpetuating Israel's occupation.

Four female Nobel peace laureates had sent a letter April 28 to the Associated Students at Berkeley in support of the divestment bill.

The San Diego bill was sponsored by several campus organizations, including Students for Justice in Palestine and the Student Sustainability Collective. The resolution identifies by name General Electric and United Technologies, "companies that materially support the occupation of the Palestinian territories."

Unlike the Berkeley measure, the San Diego resolution also condemns human rights violations around the world, though seven of the resolution's 13 points specify Israel and its conflict with the Palestinians.

Goldstone attends grandson's bar mitzvah without incident

JTA

JOHANNESBURG — Richard Goldstone attended his grandson's bar mitzvah without protests.

Members of the congregation stood at the road leading to the Beth Hamedrash Hagadol Shul in Sandton, South Africa, to make sure that only family and their guests entered for last Saturday's service, the South Africa Times reported.

Goldstone, the author of a United Nations report on the 2009 Gaza war that many deemed unfair to Israel, originally had planned to skip the bar mitzvah after the South African Zionist Federation threatened to protest the former South African judge outside the synagogue.

The South African Jewish Board of Deputies brokered a deal last month between Goldstone and community organizations angry with him over his report in which the Jewish groups agreed not to protest during the bar mitzvah celebrations and Goldstone agreed to meet with the leadership of South African Jewish communal organizations.

British elections are 'up in the air'

By WINSTON PICKETT
JTA

LONDON — With Britain's three-way race for prime minister entering the final lap, many Jews in Britain are wondering what Nick Clegg's meteoric rise – and the possibility of a "hung parliament" – means for them.

The dark-horse candidate from the Liberal Democratic party has upended British politics with a surge in the polls that has put him in a virtual dead heat with the two other hopefuls for Britain's top office, the incumbent, Gordon Brown of the Labour party, and David Cameron of the Conservative party, who holds a slight edge in the polls.

Nick Clegg

As no single party is expected to capture a majority of Parliament's 650 seats in the May 6 ballot – known as a hung parliament – the office of prime minister may go to whichever party leader is able to secure a coalition deal or win the support of another party.

While Clegg, whose candidacy has drawn comparisons to that of Barack Obama, is unlikely to be that man, his party's strength significantly increases the chances that the Liberal Democrats either will be a governing coalition partner, or that Clegg's party will exact concessions in exchange for throwing its support behind a minority government of either the Conservatives or Labour.

"So many things are up in the air," said Rosalind Preston, a vice-president of the national Jewish umbrella body, the Board of Deputies of British Jews. "But one thing is certain: Whoever is elected will have to deal with some very real and pressing issues, not only on the national and international level, but as they affect British Jews on the home front."

British Jews, she said, are concerned with "boycotts of Israeli goods, the spike of anti-Israeli resolutions and speakers on university campuses, and the impact of the economy on the social service sector."

With the possibility looming that the ruling party will form a coalition with the Liberal Democrats, British Jews are preoccupied with the party's record on Israel.

During the 2009 war in Gaza between Israel and Hamas, Clegg penned an op-ed in the Guardian newspaper calling on Labor to "condemn unambiguously Israel's tactics" and demanding an immediate arms boycott of Israel by Britain and the European Union. Last December he was the lead signatory of a letter claiming that Israel has 1.5 million Palestinian prisoners, and he wrote that the legacy of Israel's operation in Gaza is a "living nightmare" for Gaza's residents.

Clegg's party also has come under fire in pro-Israel circles for the activities of Jenny Tonge, a former member of Parliament who became a member of the House of Lords in 2005. In 2004, Tonge said she would become a suicide bomber if she had to suffer the indignities of the Palestinians. In 2006 she suggested that the pro-Israel lobby had "financial grips" on Britain and on her party. Last March she met with Hamas leader Khaled Mashaal in Syria.

The last straw came in February, when Tonge called for an inquiry into the far-fetched claim that Israel Defence Forces' earthquake relief teams in Haiti harvested the organs of quake victims. Tonge's remark prompted Clegg to fire her as the party's spokeswoman for health in the House of Lords. Critics said the move came too late.

It didn't help the party's reputation in pro-Israel circles when William Wallace, a deputy Liberal Democratic leader in the House of Lords, offered a politically tone-deaf address when he met with the Board of Deputies of British Jews on April 18. Wallace defended Tonge's "over-emotional approach" to Palestinian rights, called Israel's Likud government "very intolerant of all criticism" and said Israel's blockade of Gaza constituted "collective punishment." Several members of the Board of Deputies walked out of the meeting in protest.

Later, a Liberal Democratic spokesperson denied that the speech was anti-Israel and told the Jewish Chronicle, "It was because we are friends of Israel that we will be candid and critical."

Meanwhile, Clegg used the second of three U.S.-style national debates to slam the Conservative party for making common cause with far rightists and anti-Semites in Europe. In the April 22 debate, Clegg said Cameron has aligned himself with "nutters, anti-Semites, people who deny climate change exists and homophobes" in the European Parliament.

Clegg was referring to Cameron's decision last year to ally the Conservative party with right-wing nationalist parties in the European Conservatives and Reformists (ECR) grouping in Brussels.

Brown also criticized Cameron for his alliances.

"These are the friends David Cameron has chosen in order to satisfy the Euro-skeptic wing of his party," Brown said. "I think that demonstrates poor judgment, and that British voters should understand the compromises to British values and British influence that the Tories are prepared to make in order to appease a significant section of their fanatical backbenchers."

Cameron dismissed Brown's charges as slurs, denied that the party is associated with anti-Semites and affirmed the Conservative party's pro-Israel record.

In such a closely contested and unpredictable national election, the three main parties are scrambling to chase every vote, including the Jewish ones.

While Jews traditionally have favoured Labour over the Conservatives, Jews are upset with Labor's failure to amend the universal jurisdiction law that permits private citizens to apply for the arrest of Israeli politicians for alleged war crimes while they are on British soil.

Cameron has said he would rescind the law.

As concerned as British Jews are with the party leadership race, because voters don't vote directly for the prime minister, the race will be determined in large part by which way the votes go in local races, where bread-and-butter issues prevail.
